PREFACE.

It is the fate of those who toil at the lower employments of life, to be rather driven by the fear of evil, than attracted by the prospect of good; to be exposed to censure, without hope of praise; to be disgraced by miscarriage, or punished for neglect, where success would have been without applause, and diligence without reward.

Among these unhappy mortals is the writer of dictionaries; whom mankind have considered, not as the pupil, but the slave of science, the pioneer of literature, doomed only to remove rubbish and clear obstructions from the paths through which Learning and Genius press forward to conquer and glory, without bestowing a smile on the humble drudge that facilitates their progress. Every other author may aspire to praise; the lexicographer can only hope to escape reproach, and even this negative recompense has been yet granted to very few.

I have, notwithstanding this discouragement, attempted a Dictionary of the English language, which, while it was employed in the cultivation of every species of literature, has itself been hitherto neglected; suffered to spread, under the direction of chance, into wild exuberance; resigned to the tyranny of time and fashion; and exposed to the corruptions of ignorance, and caprices of innovation.

When I took the first survey of my undertaking, I found our speech copious without order, and energetick without rules: wherever I turned my view there was perplexity to be disentangled, and confusion to be regulated; choice was to be made out of boundless variety, without any established principle of selection; adulterations were to be detected, without a settled test of purity; and modes of expression to be rejected or received, without the suffrages of any writers of classical reputation or acknowledged authority.

Having therefore no assistance but from general grammar, I applied myself to the perusal of our writers; and noting whatever might be of use to ascertain or illustrate any word or phrase, accumulated in time the materials of a dictionary, which, by degrees, I reduced to method, establishing to myself, in the progress of the work, such rules as experience and analogy suggested to me; experience, which practice and observation were continually increasing; and analogy, which, though in some words obscure, was evident in others.

In adjusting the Orthography, which has been to this time unsettled and fortuitous, I found it necessary to distinguish those irregularities that are inherent in our tongue, and perhaps coeval with it, from others which the ignorance or negligence of later writers has produced. Every language has its anomalies, which, though inconvenient, and in themselves once unnecessary, must be tolerated among the imperfections of human things, and which required only to be registered, that they may not be increased, and ascertained, that they may not be confounded: but every language has likewise its improprieties and absurdities, which it is the duty of the lexicographer to correct or proscribe.

As language was at its beginning merely oral, all words of necessary or common use were spoken before they were written; and while they were unfixed by any visible signs, must have been spoken with great diversity, as we now observe those who cannot read to catch sounds imperfectly, and utter them negligently. When this wild and barbarous jargon was first reduced to an alphabet, every penman endeavoured to express, as he could, the sounds which he was accustomed to pronounce or to receive, and vitiated in writing such words as were already vitiated in speech. The powers of the letters, when they were applied to a new language, must have been vague and unsettled, and therefore different hands would exhibit the same sound by different combinations.

From this uncertain pronunciation arise in a great part the various dialects of the same country, which will always be observed to grow fewer, and less different, as books are multiplied; and from this arbitrary representation of sounds by letters, proceeds that diversity of spelling observable in the Saxon remains, and I suppose in the first books of every nation, which perplexes or destroys analogy, and produces anomalous formations, that, being once incorporated, can never be afterwards dismissed or reformed.

Of this kind are the derivatives length from long, strength from strong, darling from dear, breadth from broad, from dry, drought, and from high, height, which Milton, in zeal for analogy, writes highth; Quid te exempla juvat spinis de pluribus una? to change all would be too much, and to change one is nothing.

This uncertainty is most frequent in the vowels, which are so capriciously pronounced, and so differently modified, by accident or affectation, not only in every province, but in every mouth, that to them, as is well known to etymologists, little regard is to be shewn in the deduction of one language from another.

Such defects are not errors in orthography, but spots of barbarity impressed so deep in the English language, that criticism can never wash them away: these, therefore, must be permitted to remain untouched; but many words have likewise been altered by accident, or depraved by ignorance, as the pronunciation of the vulgar has been weakly followed; and some still continue to be variously written, as authors differ in their care or skill: of these it was proper to enquire the true orthography, which I have always considered as depending on their derivation, and have therefore referred them to their original languages: thus I write enchant, enchantment, enchanter, after the French, and incantation after the Latin; thus entire is chosen rather than intire, because it passed to us not from the Latin integer, but from the French entier.

Of many words it is difficult to say whether they were immediately received from the Latin or the French, since at the time when we had dominions in France, we had Latin service in our churches. It is, however, my opinion, that the French generally supplied us; for we have few Latin words, among the terms of domestic use, which are not French; but many French, which are very remote from Latin.

Even in words of which the derivation is apparent, I have been often obliged to sacrifice uniformity to custom; thus I write, in compliance with a numberless majority, convey and inveigh, deceit and receipt, fancy and phantom; sometimes the derivative varies from the primitive, as explain and explanation, repeat and repetition.

Some combinations of letters having the same power, are used indifferently without any discoverable reason of choice, as in choak, choke; sop, sope; jewel, fuel, and many others; which I have sometimes inserted twice, that those who search for them under either form, may not search in vain.

In examining the orthography of any doubtful word, the mode of spelling by which it is inserted in the series of the dictionary, is to be considered as that to which I give, perhaps not often rashly, the preference. I have left, in the examples, to every author his own practice un molested, that the reader may balance suffrages, and judge between us: but this question is not always to be determined by reputed or by real learning; some men, intent upon greater things, have thought little on sounds and derivations; some, knowing in the ancient tongues, have neglected those in which our words are commonly to be sought. Thus Hammond writes fecibility for feasibleness, because I suppose he imagined it derived immediately from the Latin; and some words, such as dependant, dependent; dependance, dependence, vary their final syllable, as one or another language is present to the writer.

In this part of the work, where caprice has long wonted without control, and vanity sought praise by petty reformation, I have endeavoured to proceed with a scholar's reverence for antiquity, and a grammarian's regard to the genius of our tongue. I have attempted few alterations, and among those few, perhaps the greater part is from the modern to the ancient practice; and I hope I may be allowed to recommend to those, whose thoughts have been perhaps employed too anxiously on verbal singularities, not to disturb, upon narrow views, or for minute propriety, the orthography of their fathers. It has been asserted, that for the law to be known, is of more importance than to be right. Change, says Hooker, is not made without inconvenience, even from worse to better. There is in constancy and stability a general and lasting advantage, which will always overbalance the slow improvements of gradual correction. Much less ought our written language to comply with the corruptions of oral utterance, or copy that which every variation of time or place makes different from itself, and imitate those changes, which will again be changed, while imitation is employed in observing them.

This recommendation of steadiness and uniformity does not proceed from an opinion, that particular combinations of letters have much influence on human happiness; or that truth may not be successfully taught by modes of spelling fanciful and erroneous: I am not yet so lost in lexicography, as to forget that words are the daughters of earth, and that things are the sons of heaven. Language is only the instrument of science, and words are but the signs of ideas: I wish, however, that the instrument might be less apt to decay, and that signs might be permanent, like the things which they denote.

In settling the orthography, I have not wholly neglected the pronunciation, which I have directed, by printing an accent upon the acute or elevated syllable. It will sometimes be found, that the accent is placed by the author quoted, on a different syllable from that marked in the alphabetical series; it is then to be understood, that custom has varied, or that the author has, in my opinion, pronounced wrong. Short directions are sometimes given where the sound of letters is irregular; and if they are sometimes omitted, defect in such minute observations will be more easily excused, than superfluous.

In the investigation both of the orthography and signification of words, their Etymology was necessarily to be considered, and they were therefore to be divided into primitives and derivatives. A primitive word, is that which can be traced no further to any English root; thus circumspect, circumvent, circumstance, delude, concave, and complicate, though compounds in the Latin, are to us primitives. Derivatives are all those that can be referred to any word in English of greater simplicity.

The derivatives I have referred to their primitives, with an accuracy sometimes needless; for who does not see that remoteness comes from remote, lovely from love, concavity from concave, and demonstrative from demonstrate? but this grammatical exuberance the scheme of my work did not allow me to repress. It is of great importance, in examining the general fabric of a language, to trace one word from another, by noting the usual modes of derivation and inflection; and uniformity must be preserved in systematical works, though sometimes at the expense of particular propriety.

Among other derivatives I have been careful to insert and elucidate the anomalous plurals of nouns and preterites of verbs, which in the Teutonic dialects are very frequent, and, though familiar to those who have always used them, interrupt and embarrass the learners of our language.

The two languages from which our primitives have been derived are the Roman and Teutonic: under the Roman I comprehend the French and provincial tongues; and under the Teutonic range the Saxon, German, and all their kindred dialects. Most of our polysyllables are Roman, and our words of one syllable are very often Teutonic.

In assigning the Roman original, it has perhaps sometimes happened that I have mentioned only the Latin, when the word was borrowed from the French; and considering myself as employed only in the illustration of my own language, I have not been very careful to observe whether the Latin word be pure or barbarous, or the French elegant or obsolete.

For the Teutonic etymologies I am commonly indebted to Junius and Skinner, the only names which I have forborne to quote when I copied their books; not that I might appropriate their labours or usurp their honours, but that I might spare a general repetition by one general acknowledgment. Of these, whom I ought not to mention but with the reverence due to instructors and benefactors, Junius appears to have excelled in extent of learning, and Skinner in rectitude of understanding. Junius was accurately skilled in all the northern languages, Skinner probably examined the ancient and remoter dialects only by occasional inspection into dictionaries; but the learning of Junius is often of no other use than to show him a track by which he may deviate from his purpose, to which Skinner always presses forward by the shortest way. Skinner is often ignorant, but never ridiculous: Junius is always full of knowledge; but his variety distracts his judgment, and his learning is very frequently disgraced by his absurdities.

The votaries of the northern muses will not perhaps easily restrain their indignation, when they find the name of Junius thus degraded by a disadvantageous comparison; but whatever reverence is due to his diligence, or his attainments, it can be no criminal degree of censoriousness to charge that etymologist with want of judgment, who can seriously derive dream from drama, because life is a drama, and a drama is a dream; and who declares with a tone of defiance, that no man can fail to derive moan from μῶνος, monos, single or solitary, who considers that grief naturally loves to be alone.*

Our knowledge of the northern literature is so scanty, that of words undoubtedly Teutonick, the original is not always found in any ancient language; and I have therefore inserted Dutch or German substitutes, which I consider not as radical, but parallel, not as the parents, but sisters of the English.

The words which are represented as thus related by descent or cognation, do not always agree in sense; for it is incident to words, as to their authors, to degenerate from their ancestors, and to change their manners when they change their country. It is sufficient, in etymological enquiries, if the senses of kindred words be found such as may easily pass into each other, or such as may both be referred to one general idea.

The etymology, so far as it is yet known, was easily found in the volumes where it is particularly and professedly delivered; and, by proper attention to the rules of derivation, the orthography was soon adjusted. But to collect the Words of our language was a task of greater difficulty: the deficiency of dictionaries was immediately apparent; and when they were exhausted, what was yet wanting must be sought by fortuitous and unguided excursions into books, and gleaned as industry should find, or chance should offer it, in the boundless chaos of a living speech. My search, however, has been either skilful or lucky; for I have much augmented the vocabulary.

As my design was a dictionary, common or apppellative, I have omitted all words which have relation to proper names; such as Arian, Socinian, Calvinist, Benedictine, Mahometan; but have retained those of a more general nature, as Heathen, Pagan.

Of the terms of art I have received such as could be found either in books of science or technical dictionaries; and have often inserted, from philosophical writers, words which are supported perhaps only by a single authority, and which being not admitted into general use, stand yet as candidates or probationers, and must depend for their adoption on the suffrage of futurity.

The words which our authors have introduced by their knowledge of foreign languages, or ignorance of their own, by vanity or wantonness, by compliance with fashion or lust of innovation, I have registered as they occurred, though commonly only to censure them, and warn others against the folly of naturalizing useless foreigners to the injury of the natives.

I have not rejected any by design, merely because they were unnecessary or exuberant; but have received those which by different writers have been differently formed, as viscic, and viscosity, viscous, and viscosity.

Compounded or double words I have seldom noted, except when they obtain a signification different from that which the components have in their simple state. Thus highwayman, woodman, and horse-course, require an explanation; but of thieflike or coachdriver no notice was needed, because the primitives contain the meaning of the compounds.

Words arbitrarily formed by a constant and settled analogy, like diminutive adjectives in ish, as greenish, bluish; adverbs in ly, as dully, openly; substantives in ness, as vileness, faultless; were less

* That I may not appear to have spoken too irreverently of Junius, I have here subjoined a few specimens of his etymological extravagance.

 PREFACE.

diligently sought, and sometimes have been omitted, when I had no authority that invited me to insert them; not that they are not genuine and regular offsprings of English roots, but because their relation to the primitive being always the same, their signification cannot be mistaken.

The verbal nouns in ing, such as the keepong of the caste, the leading of the army, are always neglected, or placed only to illustrate the sense of the verb, except when they signify things as well as actions, and have therefore a plural number, as dwelling, living; or have an absolute and abstract signification, as colouring, painting, learning.

The participles are likewise omitted, unless, by signifying rather habit or quality than action, they take the nature of adjectives; as a thinking man, a man of prudence; a pacing horse, a horse that can pace: these I have ventured to call participial adjectives. But neither are these always inserted, because they are commonly to be understood, without any danger of mistake, by consulting the verb.

Obsolete words are admitted, when they are found in authors not obsolete, or when they have any force or beauty that may deserve revival.

As composition is one of the chief characteristicks of a language, I have endeavoured to make some reparation for the universal negligence of my predecessors, by inserting great numbers of compounded words, as may be found under after, fore, new, night, fair, and many more. These, numerous as they are, might be multiplied, but that use and curiosity are here satisfied, and the frame of our language and modes of our combination amply discovered.

Of some forms of composition, such as that by which re is prefixed to note repetition, and un to signify contrariety or privation, all the examples cannot be accumulated, because the use of these particles, if not wholly arbitrary, is so little limited, that they are hourly affixed to new words as occasion requires, or is imagined to require them.

There is another kind of composition more frequent in our language than perhaps in any other, from which arises to foreigners the greatest difficulty. We modify the signification of many words by a particle subjoined; as to come off, to escape by a fetch; to fall on, to attack; to fall off, to apostatize; to break off, to stop abruptly; to break out, to justify; to fall in, to comply; to give over, to cease; to set off, to embellish; to set in, to begin a continual tenour; to set out, to begin a course or journey; to take off, to copy; with innumerable expressions of the same kind, of which some appear widely irgular, being so far distant from the sense of the simple words, that no sagacity will be able to trace the steps by which they arrived at the present use. These I have noted with great care; and though I cannot flatter myself that the collection is complete, I believe I have so far assisted the students of our language, that this kind of phraseology will be no longer insuperable; and the combinations of verbs and particles, by chance omitted, will be easily explained by comparison with those that may be found.

Many words yet stand supported only by the name of Bailey, Ainsworth, Philips, or the contracted Dict. for Dictionaries subjoined; of these I am not always certain that they are read in any book but the works of lexicographers. Of such I have omitted many, because I had never read them; and many I have inserted, because they may perhaps exist, though they have escaped my notice: they are, however, to be yet considered as resting only upon the credit of former dictionaries. Others, which I considered as useful, or know to be proper, though I could not at present support them by authorities, I have suffered to stand upon my own attestation, claiming the same privilege with my predecessors, of being sometimes credited without proof.

The words, thus selected and disposed, are grammatically considered; they are referred to the different parts of speech; traced, when they are irregularly inflected, through their various terminations; and illustrated by observations, not indeed of great or striking importance, separately considered, but necessary to the elucidacon of our language, and hitherto neglected or forgotten by English grammarians.

That part of my work on which I expect malignity most frequently to fasten, is the Explanation; in which I cannot hope to satisfy those, who are perhaps not inclined to be pleased, since I have not always been able to satisfy myself. To interpret a language by itself is very difficult; many words cannot be explained by synonyms, because the idea signified by them has not more than one appellation; nor by paraphrase, because simple ideas cannot be described. When the nature of things is unknown, or the notion unsettled and indefinite, and various in various minds, the words by which such notions are conveyed, or such things denoted, will be ambiguous and perplexed. And such is the fate of hapless lexicography, that not only darkness, but light, impedes and distresses it; things may be not only too little, but too much known, to be happily illustrated. To explain, requires the use of terms less abstruse than that which is to be explained, and such terms cannot always be found; for as nothing can be proved but the supposing something intuitively known, and evident without proof, so nothing can be defined but by the use of words too plain to admit a definition.

Other words there are, of which the sense is too subtle and evanescent to be fixed in a paraphrase; such are all those which are by the grammarians termed expletives, and, in dead languages, are suffered to pass for empty sounds, of no other use than to fill a verse, or to modulate a period, but which are easily perceived in living tongues to have power and emphasis, though it be sometimes such as no other form of expression can convey.

My labour has likewise been much increased by a class of verbs too frequent in the English language, of which the signification is so loose and general, the use so vague and indeterminate, and the senses detorted so widely from the first idea, that it is hard to trace them through the maze of variation, to catch them on the brink of utter inanity, to circumscribe them by any limitations, or interpret them by any words of distinct and settled meaning; such are bear, break, come, cast, full, get, give, do, put, set, go, run, make, take, turn, throw. Of these the whole power is not accurately delivered, it must be remembered, that while our language is yet living, and variable by the caprice of every one that speaks it, these words are hourly shifting their relations, and can no more be ascertained in a dictionary, than a grove, in the agitation of a storm, can be accurately delineated from its picture in the water.

The particles are among all nations applied with so great latitude, that they are not easily reducible under any regular scheme of explication: this difficulty is not less, nor perhaps greater, in English, than in other languages. I have laboured them with diligence, I hope with success; such at least as can be expected in a task, which no man, however learned or sagacious, has yet been able to perform.

Some words there are which I cannot explain, because I do not understand them; these might have been omitted very often with little inconvenience, but I would not so far indulge my vanity as to decline this confession: for when Tully owns himself ignorant whether lessus, in the twelve tables, means a funeral song, or mourning garment; and Aristotle doubts whether spera, in the Iliad, signifies a mule, or muleteer, I may surely, without shame, leave some obscurities to happier industry, or future information.

The rigour of interpretative lexicography requires that the explanation, and the word explained, should be always reciprocal; this I have always endeavoured, but could not always attain. Words are seldom exactly synonymous; a new term was not introduced, but because the former was thought inadequate: names, therefore, have often many ideas, but few ideas have many names. It was then necessary to use the proximate word, for the deficiency of single terms can very seldom be supplied by circumlocution; nor is the inconvenience great of such mutilated interpretations, because the sense may easily be collected entire from the examples.

In every word of extensive use, it was requisite to mark the progress of its meaning, and show by what gradations of intermediate sense it has passed from its primitive to its remote and accidental signification; so that every foregoing explanation should tend to that which follows, and the series be regularly concatenated from the first notion to the last.

This is specious, but not always practicable; kindred senses may be so interwoven, that the perplexity cannot be disentangled, nor any reason be assigned why one should be ranged before the other. When the radical idea branches out into parallel ramifications, how can a consecutive series be formed of senses in their nature collateral? The shades of meaning sometimes pass imperceptibly into each other; so that though on one side they apparently differ, yet it is impossible to mark the point of contact. Ideas of the same race, though not exactly alike, are sometimes so little different, that no words can express the dissimilitude, though the mind easily perceives it, when they are exhibited together; and sometimes there is such a confusion of acceptations, that discernment is wearied, and distinction puzzled, and perseverance herself hurries to an end, by crowding together what she cannot separate.

These complaints of difficulty will, by those that have never considered words beyond their popular use, be thought only the jargon of a man willing to magnify his labours, and procure veneration to his studies by invocation and obscurity. But every art is obscure to those that have not learned it: this uncertainty of terms, and commixture of ideas, is well known to those who have joined philosophy with

Grammar: and if I have not expressed them very clearly, it must be remembered that I am speaking of that which words are insufficient to explain.

The original sense of words is often driven out of use by their metaphorical acceptations; yet must be inserted for the sake of a regular origination. Thus I know not whether ardour is used for material heat, or whether flagrant in English, ever signifies the same with burning; yet such are the primitive ideas of these words, which are therefore set first, though without examples, that the figurative senses may be commodiously deduced.

Such is the exuberance of signification which many words have obtained, that it was scarcely possible to collect all their senses: sometimes the meaning of derivatives must be sought in the mother term, and sometimes deficient explanations of the primitives may be supplied in the train of derivation. In any case of doubt or difficulty, it will be always proper to examine all the words of the same race; for some words are slightly passed over to avoid repetition, some admitted easier and clearer explanation than others, and all will be better understood, as they are considered in greater variety of structures and relations.

All the interpretations of words are not written with the same skill, or the same happiness: things equally easy in themselves, are not all equally easy to any single mind. Every writer of a long work commits errors, where there appears neither ambiguity to mislead, nor obscurity to confound him; and in a search like this, many felicities of expression will be casually overlooked, many convenient parallels will be forgotten, and many particulars will admit improvement from a mind utterly unequal to the whole performance.

But many seeming faults are to be imputed rather to the nature of the undertaking, than the negligence of the performer. Thus some explanations are unavoidably reciprocal or circular, as hind, the female of the stag; stag, the male of the hind: sometimes easier words are changed into harder, as burial into sepulture or interment, drier into desiccative, dryness into siccity or aridity, fit into paroxysm; for the easiest word, whatever it be, can never be translated into one more easy. But easiness and difficulty are merely relative, and if the present prevalence of our language should invite foreigners to this dictionary, many will be assisted by those words which now seem only to produce increase or obscurity. For this reason I have endeavored frequently to join a Teutonic and Roman interpretation, as to cheer, to gladden, or exhilarate, that every learner of English may be assisted by his own tongue.

The solution of all difficulties, and the supply of all defects, must be sought in the examples, subjoined to the various senses of each word, and ranged according to the time of their authors.

When I first collected these authorities, I was desirous that every quotation should be useful to some other end than the illustration of a word; I therefore extracted from philosophers principles of science; from historians remarkable facts; from chymists complete processes; from divines striking exhortations; and from poets beautiful descriptions. Such is design, while it is yet at a distance from execution. When the time called upon me to range this accumulation of elegance and wisdom into an alphabetical series, I soon discovered that the bulk of my volumes would fright away the student, and was forced to depart from my scheme of including all that was pleasing or useful in English literature, and reduce my transcripts very often to clusters of words, in which scarcely any meaning is retained; thus to the weariness of copying, I was condemned to add the vexation of expunging. Some passages I have yet spared, which may relieve the labour of verbal searches, and intersperse with verdure and flowers the dusty deserts of barren philology.

The examples, thus mutilated, are no longer to be considered as conveying the sentiments or doctrine of their authors; the word for the sake of which they are inserted, with all its appendant clauses, has been carefully preserved; but it may sometimes happen, by hasty truncation, that the general tendency of the sentence may be changed: the divine may desert his tenets, or the philosopher his system.

Some of the examples have been taken from writers who were never mentioned as masters of elegance or models of style; but words must be sought where they are used; and in what pages, eminent for purity, can terms of manufacture or agriculture be found? Many quotations serve no other purpose, than that of proving the bare existence of words, and are therefore selected with less scrupulousness than those which are to teach their structures and relations.
My purpose was to admit no testimony of living authors, that I might not be misled by partiality, and that none of my contemporaries might have reason to complain; nor have I departed from this resolution, but when some performance of uncommon excellence excited my veneration, when my memory supplied me, from late books, with an example that was wanting, or when my heart, in the tenderness of friendship, solicited admission for a favourite name.

So far have I been from any care to grace my pages with modern decorations, that I have studiously endeavoured to collect examples and authorities from the writers before the restoration, whose works I regard as the wells of English undefiled, as the pure sources of genuine diction. Our language, for almost a century, has, by the concurrence of many causes, been gradually departing from its original Teutonic character, and deviating towards a Gallic structure and phraseology, from which it ought to be our endeavour to recall it, by making our ancient volumes the groundwork of style, admitting among the additions of later times, only such as may supply real deficiencies, such as are readily adopted by the genius of our tongue, and incorporate easily with our native idioms.

But as every language has a time of rudeness antecedent to perfection, as well as of false refinement and declension, I have been cautious lest my zeal for antiquity might drive me into times too remote, and crowd my book with words now no longer understood. I have fixed Sidney's work for the boundary, beyond which I make few excursions. From the authors which rose in the time of Elizabeth, a speech might be formed adequate to all the purposes of use and elegance. If the language of theology were extracted from Hooker and the translation of the Bible; the terms of natural knowledge from Bacon; the phrases of policy, war, and navigation from Raleigh; the dialect of poetry and fiction from Spenser and Sidney; and the diction of common life from Shakespeare, few ideas would be lost to mankind, for want of English words, in which they might be expressed.

It is not sufficient that a word is found, unless it be so combined as that its meaning is apparently determined by the tract and tenor of the sentence; such passages I have therefore chosen, and when it happened that any author gave a definition of a term, or such an explanation as is equivalent to a definition, I have placed his authority as a supplement to my own, without regard to the chronological order, that is otherwise observed.

Some words, indeed, stand unsupported by any authority, but they are commonly derivative nouns, or adverbs, formed from their primitives by regular and constant analogy, or names of things seldom occurring in books, or words of which I have reason to doubt the existence.

There is more danger of censure from the multiplicity than paucity of example; authorities will sometimes seem to have been accumulated without necessity or use, and perhaps some will be found, which might, without loss, have been omitted. But a work of this kind is not hastily to be charged with superfluities: those quotations, which to careless or unskilful perusers appear only to repeat the same sense, will often exhibit, to a more accurate examiner, diversities of signification, or, at least, afford different shades of the same meaning: one will shew the word applied to persons, another to things; one will express an ill, another a good, and a third a neutral sense; one will prove the expression genuine from an ancient author; another will shew it elegant from a modern: a doubtful authority is corroborated by another of more credit; an ambiguous sentence is ascertained by a passage clear and determinate; the word, how often soever repeated, appears with new associates and in different combinations, and every quotation contributes something to the stability or enlargement of the language.

When words are used equivocally, I receive them in either sense; when they are metaphorical, I adopt them in their primitive acceptation.

I have sometimes, though rarely, yielded to the temptation of exhibiting a genealogy of sentiments, by shewing how one author copied the thoughts and diction of another: such quotations are indeed little more than repetitions, which might justly be censured, did they not gratify the mind, by affording a kind of intellectual history.

The various syntactical structures occurring in the examples have been carefully noted; the licence or negligence with which many words have been hitherto used, has made our style capricious and indeterminate; when the different combinations of the same word are exhibited together, the preference is readily given to propriety, and I have often endeavoured to direct the choice.

Thus have I laboured by settling the orthography, displaying the analogy, regulating the structures, and ascertaining the signification of English words, to perform all the parts of a faithful lexicographer: but I have not always executed my own scheme, or satisfied my own expectations. The work, whatever proofs of diligence and attention it may exhibit, is yet capable of many improvements: the orthography which I recommend is still controvertible, the etymology which I adopt is uncertain, and perhaps frequently erroneous; the explanations are sometimes too much contracted, and sometimes too much diffused, the significations are distinguished rather with subtility than skill, and the attention is harassed with unnecessary minuteness.

The examples are too often injudiciously truncated, and perhaps sometimes, I hope very rarely, alleged in a mistaken sense; for in making this collection I trusted more to memory, than, in a state of disquiet and embarrassment, memory can contain, and purposed to supply at the review what was left incomplete in the first transcription.

Many terms appropriated to particular occupations, though necessary and significant, are undoubtedly omitted; and of the words most studiously considered and exemplified, many senses have escaped observation.

Yet these failures, however frequent, may admit extenuation and apology. To have attempted much is always laudable, even when the enterprise is above the strength that undertakes it: To rest below his own aim is incident to every one whose fancy is active, and whose views are comprehensive; nor is any man satisfied with himself because he has done much, but because he can conceive little. When first I engaged in this work, I resolved to leave neither words nor things unexamined, and pleased myself with a prospect of the hours which I should revel away in feasts of literature, the obscure recesses of northern learning which I should enter and ransack, the treasures with which I expected every search into those neglected mines to reward my labour, and the triumph with which I should display my acquisitions to mankind. When I had thus enquired into the original of words, I resolved to shew likewise my attention to things; to pierce deep into every science, to enquire the nature of every substance of which I inserted the name, to limit every idea by a definition strictly logical, and exhibit every production of art or nature in an accurate description, that my book might be in place of all other dictionaries whether appellative or technical. But these were the dreams of a poet doomed at last to wake a lexicographer. I soon found that it is too late to look for instruments, when the work calls for execution, and that whatever abilities I had brought to my task, with those I must finally perform it. To deliberate whenever I doubted, to enquire whenever I was ignorant, would have protracted the undertaking without end, and, perhaps, without much improvement; for I did not find by my first experiments, that what I had not of my own was easily to be obtained: I saw that one enquiry only gave occasion to another, that book referred to book, that to search was not always to find, and to find was not always to be informed; and that thus to pursue perfection, was, like the first inhabitants of Arcadia, to chase the sun, which, when they had reached the hill where he seemed to rest, was still beheld at the same distance from them.

I then contracted my design, determining to confide in myself, and no longer to solicit auxiliaries, which produced more incumbrance than assistance; by this I obtained at least one advantage, that I set limits to my work, which would in time be ended, though not completed.

Despondency has never so far prevailed as to depress me to negligence; some faults will at last appear to be the effects of anxious diligence and preserving activity. The nice and subtle ramifications of meaning were not easily avoided by a mind intent upon accuracy, and convinced of the necessity of disentangling combinations, and separating similitudes. Many of the distinctions, which to common readers appear useless and idle, will be found real and important by men versed in the school philosophy, without which no dictionary can ever be accurately compiled, or skilfully examined.

Some senses however there are, which, though not the same, are yet so nearly allied, that they are often confounded. Most men think indifferently, and therefore cannot speak with exactness; and consequently some examples might be indifferently put to either signification: this uncertainty is not to be imputed to me, who do not form, but register the language; who do not teach men how they should think, but relate how they have hitherto expressed their thoughts.

The imperfect sense of some examples I lamented, but could not remedy, and hope they will be compensated by innumerable passages selected with propriety, and preserved with exactness; some shining with sparks of imagination, and some replete with treasures of wisdom.
The orthography and etymology, though imperfect, are not imperfect for want of care, but because care will not always be successful, and recollection or information come too late for use.

That many terms of art and manufacture are omitted, must be frankly acknowledged; but for this defect I may boldly allege that it was unavoidable: I could not visit caverns to learn the miner's language, nor take a voyage to perfect my skill in the dialect of navigation, nor visit the warehouses of merchants, and shops of artificers, to gain the names of wares, tools and operations, of which no mention is found in books; what favourable accident, or easy enquiry brought within my reach, has not been neglected; but it had been a hopeless labour to glean up words, bycourting living information, andcontesting with the sullenness of one, and the roughness of another.

To furnish the academicians della Crusca with words of this kind, a series of comedies called la Fiera, or the Fair, was professedly written by Buonaroti; but I had no such assistant, and therefore was content to want what they must have wanted likewise, had they not luckily been so supplied.

Nor are all words which are not found in the vocabulary, to be lamented as omissions. Of the laborious and mercantile part of the people, the diction is in a great measure casual and mutable; many of their terms are formed for some temporary or local convenience, and though current at certain times and places, are in others utterly unknown. This fugitive cant, which is always in a state of increase or decay, cannot be regarded as any part of the durable materials of a language, and therefore must be suffered to perish with other things unworthy of preservation.

Care will sometimes betray to the appearance of negligence. He that is catching opportunities which seldom occur, will suffer those to pass by unregarded, which he expects hourly to return; he that is searching for rare and remote things, will neglect those that are obvious and familiar; thus many of the most common and cursory words have been inserted with little illustration, because in gathering the authorities, I forbore to copy those which I thought likely to occur whenever they were wanted. It is remarkable that, in reviewing my collection, I found the word S.E.A. unexamined.

Thus it happens, that in things difficult there is danger from ignorance, and in things easy from confidence; the mind, afraid of greatness, and disdainful of littleness, hastily withdraws herself from painful searches, and passes with scornful rapidity over tasks not adequate to her powers, sometimes too secure for caution, and again too anxious for vigorous effort; sometimes idle in a plain path, and sometimes distracted in labyrinths, and dissipated by different intentions.

A large work is difficult because it is large, even though all its parts might singly be performed with facility; where there are many things to be done, each must be allowed its share of time and labour, in the proportion only which it bears to the whole; nor can it be expected, that the stones which form the dome of a temple, should be squared and polished like the diamond of a ring.

Of the event of this work, for which, having laboured it with so much application, I cannot but have some degree of parental fondness, it is natural to form conjectures. Those who have been persuaded to think well of my design, will require that it should fix our language, and put a stop to those alterations which time and chance have hitherto been suffered to make in it without opposition. With this consequence I will confess that I flattered myself for a while; but now begin to fear that I have indulged expectation which neither reason nor experience can justify. When we see men grow old and die at a certain time one after another, from century to century, we laugh at the elixir that promises to prolong life to a thousand years; and with equal justice may the lexicographer be derided, who being able to produce no example of a nation that has preserved their words and phrases from mutability, shall imagine that his dictionary can embalm his language, and secure it from corruption and decay, that it is in his power to change sublunary nature, and clear the world at once from folly, vanity and affectation.

With this hope, however, academies have been instituted, to guard the avenues of their languages, to retain fugitives, and repulse intruders; but their vigilance and activity have hitherto been vain; sounds are too volatile and subtle for legal restraints; to enchain syllables, and to lash the wind, are equally the undertakings of pride, unwilling to measure its desires by its strength. The French language has visibly changed under the inspection of the academy; the style of Amelot's translation of father Paul is observed by Le Courayer to be un peu passé; and no Italian will maintain, that the diction of any modern writer is not perceptibly different from that of Boccace, Machiavel, or Caro.

Total and sudden transformations of a language seldom happen; conquests and migrations are now very rare: but there are other causes of change, which, though slow in their operation, and invisible in their progress, are perhaps as much superior to human resistance, as the revolutions of the sky, or intumescence of the tide. Commerce, however necessary, however lucrative, as it depraves the manners, corrupts the language; they that have frequent intercourse with strangers, to whom they endeavour to accommodate themselves, must in time learn a mingled dialect, like the jargon which serves the traffickers on the Mediterranean and Indian coasts. This will not always be confined to the exchange, the warehouse, or the port, but will be communicated by degrees to other ranks of the people, and be at last incorporated with the current speech.

There are likewise internal causes equally forcible. The language most likely to continue long without alteration, would be that of a nation raised a little, and but a little, above barbarity, secluded from strangers, and totally employed in procuring the conveniencies of life; either without books, or, like some of the Mahometan countries, with very few: men thus busied and unlearned, having only such words as common use requires, would perhaps long continue to express the same notions by the same signs. But no such constancy can be expected in a people polished by arts, and classed by subordination, where one part of the community is sustained and accommodated by the labour of the other. Those who have much leisure to think, will always be enlarging the stock of ideas; and every increase of knowledge, whether real or fancied, will produce new words, or combinations of words. When the mind is unchaunted from necessity, it will range after convenience; when it is left at large in the fields of speculation, it will shift opinions; as any custom is disused, the words that expressed it must perish with it; as any opinion grows popular, it will innovate speech in the same proportion as it alters practice.

As by the cultivation of various sciences a language is amplified, it will be more furnished with words deflected from their original sense; the geometrician will talk of a courtier's zenith, or the eccentric virtue of a wild hero, and the physician of sanguine expectations and phlegmatick delays. Copiousness of speech will give opportunities to capricious choice, by which some words will be preferred, and others degraded; vicissitudes of fashion will enforce the use of new, or extend the signification of known terms. The tropes of poetry will make hourly encroachments, and the metaphorical will become the current sense: pronunciation will be varied by levity or ignorance, and the pen must at length comply with the tongue; illiterate writers will, at one time or other, by publick infatuation, rise into renown, who, not knowing the original import of words, will use them with colloquial licentiousness, confound distinction, and forget propriety. As politeness increases, some expressions will be considered as too gross and vulgar for the delicate, others as too formal and ceremonious for the gay and airy; new phrases are therefore adopted, which must, for the same reasons, be in time dismissed. Swift, in his petty treatise on the English language, allows that new words must sometimes be introduced, but proposes that none should be suffered to become obsolete. But what makes a word obsolete, more than general agreement to forbear it? and how shall it be continued, when it conveys an offensive idea, or recalled again into the mouths of mankind, when it has once become unfamilier by disuse, and unpleasing by unfamiliarity?

There is another cause of alteration more prevalent than any other, which yet in the present state of the world cannot be obviated. A mixture of two languages will produce a third distinct from both, and they will always be mixed, where the chief part of education, and the most conspicuous accomplishment, is skill in ancient or in foreign tongues. He that has long cultivated another language, will find its words and combinations crowd upon his memory; and haste and negligence, refinement and affectation, will intrude borrowed terms and exotick expressions.

The great pest of speech is frequency of translation. No book was ever turned from one language into another, without imparting something of its native idiom; this is the most mischievous and comprehensive innovation; single words may enter by thousands, and the fabrick of the tongue continue the same; but new phraseology changes much at once; it alters not the single stones of the building, but the order of the columns. If an academy should be established for the cultivation of our style, which I, who can never wish to see dependence multiplied, hope the spirit of English liberty will hinder or destroy, let them, instead of compiling grammars and dictionaries, endeavour, with all their influence, to stop the licence of translators, whose idleness and ignorance, if it be suffered to proceed, will reduce us to babble a dialect of France.
PREFACE.

If the changes that we fear be thus irresistible, what remains but to acquiesce with silence, as in the other insurmountable distresses of humanity? It remains that we retard what we cannot repel, that we palliate what we cannot cure. Life may be lengthened by care, though death cannot be ultimately defeated: tongues, like governments, have a natural tendency to degeneration; we have long preserved our constitution, let us make some struggles for our language.

In hope of giving longevity to that which its own nature forbids to be immortal, I have devoted this book, the labour of years, to the honour of my country, that we may no longer yield the palm of philology, without a contest, to the nations of the continent. The chief glory of every people arises from its authors: whether I shall add anything by my own writings to the reputation of English literature, must be left to time: much of my life has been lost under the pressures of disease; much has been trifled away; and much has always been spent in provision for the day that was passing over me; but I shall not think my employment useless or ignoble, if by my assistance foreign nations, and distant ages, gain access to the propagators of knowledge, and understand the teachers of truth; if my labours afford light to the repositories of science, and add celebrity to Bacon, to Hooker, to Milton, and to Boyle.

When I am animated by this wish, I look with pleasure on my book, however defective, and deliver it to the world with the spirit of a man that has endeavoured well. That it will immediately become popular I have not promised to myself: a few wild blunders, and risible absurdities, from which no work of such multiplicity was ever free, may for a time furnish folly with laughter, and harden ignorance in contempt; but useful diligence will at last prevail, and there never can be wanting some who distinguish desert; who will consider that no dictionary of a living tongue ever can be perfect, since while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding, and some falling away; that a whole life cannot be spent upon syntax and etymology, and that even a whole life would not be sufficient; that he, whose design includes whatever language can express, must often speak of what he does not understand; that a writer will sometimes be hurried by eagerness to the end, and sometimes faint with weariness under a task, which Scaliger compares to the labours of the anvil and the mine; that what is obvious is not always known, and what is known is not always present; that sudden fits of inadvertency will surprize vigilance, slight avocations will seduce attention, and casual eclipses of the mind will darken learning; and that the writer shall often in vain trace his memory at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts to-morrow.

In this work, when it shall be found that much is omitted, let it not be forgotten that much likewise is performed; and though no book was ever spared out of tenderness to the author, and the world is little solicitous to know whence proceeded the faults of that which it condemns; yet it may gratify curiosity to inform it, that the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great; not in the soft obscurities of retirement, or under the shelter of academick bowers, but amidst inconvenience and distraction, in sickness and in sorrow. It may repress the triumph of malignant criticism to observe, that if our language is not here fully displayed, I have only failed in an attempt which no human powers have hitherto completed. If the lexicons of ancient tongues, now immutably fixed, and comprized in a few volumes, be yet, after the toil of successive ages, inadequate and delusive; if the aggregated knowledge, and co-operating diligence of the Italian academicians, did not secure them from the censure of Beni; if the embodied critics of France, when fifty years had been spent upon their work, were obliged to change its economy, and give their second edition another form, I may surely be contented without the praise of perfection, which, if I could obtain, in this gloom of solitude, what would it avail me? I have protracted my work till most of those whom I wished to please have sunk into the grave, and success and miscarriage are empty sounds: I therefore dismiss it with frigid tranquillity, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise.
THOUGH the Britains or Welsh were the first possessors of this island, whose names are recorded, and are therefore in civil history always considered as the predecessors of the present inhabitants; yet the deduction of the English language, from the earliest times of which we have any knowledge to its present state, requires no mention of them: for we have so few words which can, with any probability, be referred to British roots, that we justly regard the Saxons and Welsh as nations totally distinct. It has been conjectured, that when the Saxons seized this country, they suffered the Britains to live among them in a state of vassalage, employed in the culture of the ground, and other laborious and ignoble services. But it is scarcely possible, that a nation, however depressed, should have been mixed with another in considerable numbers without some communication of their tongue, and therefore, it may, with great reason, be imagined, that those, who were not sheltered in the mountains, perished by the sword.

The whole fabric and scheme of the English language is Gothick or Teutonick: it is a dialect of that tongue, which prevails over all the northern countries of Europe, except those where the Scævonian is spoken. Of these languages Dr. Hickes has thus exhibited the genealogy.

GOTHICK.

Of the Gothick, the only monument remaining is a copy of the gospels somewhat mutilated, which, from the silver with which the characters are adorned, is called the silver book. It is now preserved at Upsal, and having been twice published before, has been lately reprinted at Oxford, under the inspection of Mr. Lye, the editor of Junius. Whether the diction of this venerable manuscript be purely Gothick, has been doubted; it seems however to exhibit the most ancient dialect now to be found of the Teutonick race; and the Saxon, which is the origin of the present English, was either derived from it, or both have descended from some common parent.

What was the form of the Saxon language, when, about the year 450, they first entered Britain, cannot now be known. They seem to have been a people without learning, and very probably without an alphabet; their speech, therefore, having been always cursory and extemporaneous, must have been artless and unconnected, without any modes of transition or involution of clauses; which abruptness and inconnection may be observed even in their later writings. This barbarity may be supposed to have continued during their wars with the Britains, which for a time left them no leisure for softer studies; nor is there any reason for supposing it abated, till the year 570, when Augustine came from Rome to convert them to Christianity. The Christian religion always implies or produces a certain degree of civility and learning; they then became by degrees acquainted with the Roman language, and so gained, from time to time, some knowledge and elegance, till in three centuries they had formed a language capable of expressing all the sentiments of a civilised people, as appears by king Alfred's paraphrase or imitation of Boethius, and his short preface, which I have selected as the first specimen of ancient English.

This may perhaps be considered as a specimen of the Saxon in its highest state of purity, for here are scarcely any words borrowed from the Roman dialects.

Of the following version of the gospels the age is not certainly known, but it was probably written between the time of Alfred and that of the Norman conquest, and therefore may properly be inserted here.

Translations seldom afford just specimens of a language, and least of all those in which a scrupulous and verbal interpretation is endeavoured, because they retain the phraseology and structure of the original tongue; yet they have often this conve-
The same book, being translated in different ages, affords opportunity of marking the gradations of change, and bringing one age into comparison with another. For this purpose I have placed the Saxon version and that of Wickliffe, written about the year 1380, in opposite columns, because the convenience of easy collation seems greater than that of regular chronology.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

In the dayes of Eroude kyng of Judee ther was a prest Zacarye by name: of the sort of Abia, and his wyfe was of the doughtris of Aaron: and his name was Elizabeth.

Of the Saxon poetry some specimen is necessary, though our ignorance of the laws of their metre and the quantities of their syllables, which it would be very difficult, perhaps impossible, to recover, excludes us from that pleasure which the old bards undoubtedly gave to their contemporaries.

The first poetry of the Saxons was without rhyme, and consequently must have depended upon the quantity of their syllables; but they began in time to imitate their neighbours, and close their verses with correspondent sounds.

The two passages, which I have selected, contain apparently the rudiments of our present lyric measures, and the writers may be justly considered as the genuine ancestors of the English poets.

About the year 1150, the Saxon began to take a form in which the beginning of the present English may be plainly discovered; this change seems not to have been the effect of the Norman conquest, for very few French words are found to have been introduced in the first hundred years after it; the language must therefore have been altered by causes like those which, notwithstanding the care of writers and societies instituted to obviate them, are even now daily making innovations in every living language. I have exhibited a specimen of the language of this age from the year 1135 to 1140 of the Saxon chronicle, of which the latter part was apparently written near the time to which it relates.

Nearly about this time, the following pieces of poetry seem to have been written, of which I have inserted only short fragments; the first is a rude attempt at the present measure of eight syllables, and the second is a natural introduction to Robert of Gloucester, being composed in the same measure, which, however rude and barbarous it may seem, taught the way to the \textit{Alexandrines} of the French poetry.

In these fragments, the adulteration of the Saxon tongue, by a mixture of the Norman, becomes apparent; yet it is not so much changed by the admixture of new words, which might be imputed to commerce with the continent, as by changes of its own forms and terminations; for which no reason can be given.
ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Hitherto the language used in this island, however different in successive time, may be called Saxon; nor can it be expected, from the nature of things gradually changing, that any time can be assigned, when the Saxon may be said to cease, and the English to commence. Robert of Gloucester, however, who is placed by the critics in the thirteenth century, seems to have used a kind of intermediate diction, neither Saxon nor English; in his work therefore we see the transition exhibited, and, as he is the first of our writers in rhyme, of whom any large work remains, a more extensive quotation is extracted. He writes apparently in the same measure with the foregoing author of St. Margaret, which, polished into greater exactness, appeared to our ancestors so suitable to the genius of the English language, that it was continued in use almost to the middle of the seventeenth century.

Sir John Mandeville wrote, as he himself informs us, in the fourteenth century, and his work, which comprising a relation of many different particulars, consequently required the use of many words and phrases, may be properly specified in this place. Of the following quotations, I have chosen the first, because it shows, in some measure, the state of European science as well as of the English tongue; and the second, because it is valuable for the force of thought and beauty of expression.

IN that lond, ne in many othere bezonede that, no man may see the sterre transmontane, that is clept the sterre of the see, that is unmeuable, and that is toward the Northe, that we clepen the lode sterre. But men seen another sterre, the contrarie to him, that is toward the Southe, that is clept Antartyk. And right as the schip men taken here avys here, and governe hem be the lode sterre, right so don schip men bezonede the parties, be the sterre of the Southe, the which sterre apperethe not to us. And this sterre, that is toward the Northe, that wee clepen the lode sterre, ne apperethe not to hem. For whiche cause, men may wel perceyve, that the londe and the see ben of rownde schapp and forme. For the partie of the firmament schewethe in o contree, that schewethe not in another contree. And men may well preven be experience and fotyle compassement of wytt, that zif a man fond passages be schippes, that wolde go to serchen the world, men myghte go be schippalle aboute the world, and aboven and benethen. The whiche thing I prove thus, after that I have seyn. For I have been toward the parties of Braban, and beholden theAstrolabre, that the sterre that is clept the transmontayne, is 53 degrees highe. And more forthe in Almayne and Dewme, it hath 38 degrees. And more forthe toward the parties septemtnoneles, it is 62 degrees of heghte, and certyne mynutes. For I my self have measured it by the Astrolabre. Now schulle ze knowe that azen the Transmontayne, is the tother sterre, that is clept Antartyk; as I have seyd before. And tho 2 sterres ne meeven nevere. And be hem turnethe alle the firmament, righte as doth a wheel, that turnethe his axille tree: so that tho sterres beren the firmament in 2 egalle parties; so that it hathe als mchel aboven, as it hath benethen. Aftre this, I have gon toward the parties meridionales, that is toward the Southe: and I have founden that in Lybe, men seen first the sterre Antartyk. And so fer I have gon more in tho contrees, that I have founde that sterre more highe; so that toward the highe Lybe, it is 18 degrees of heghte, and certeyn minutes (of the which, 60 minutes maken a degree) aftre goynge be see and be londe, toward this contree, of that I have spoke, and to other yles and londes beonde that contree, I have founden the sterre Antartyk of 33 degrees of heghte, and mo minutes. And zif I hadde had companye and schippynge, for to go more beonde, I trowe wel in certyn, that we scholde have seen alle the roundnesse of the firmament alle aboute. For as I have seyd zou be furn, the half of the firmament is between tho 2 sterres: the whiche halfondelle I have seyn. And of the tother halfondelle, I have seen toward the Northe, undre the Transmontane 62 degrees and 10 minutes; and toward the partie meridionalle, I have seen undre the Antartyk 33 degrees and 16 minutes: and thanne the halfondelle of the firmament in alle, ne holdethe not but 180 degrees. And of tho 180, I have seen 62 on that o part, and 33 on that other part, that ben 95 degrees, and nyghe the halfondelle of a degree; and so there ne faylethe but that I have seen alle the firmament, saf 84 degrees and the halfondelle of a degree; and that is not the fourth the part of the firmament. For the 4 partie of the roundnesse of the firmament holt 90 degrees: so there faylethe but 5 degrees and an half of the fourth partie. And also I have seen the 3 partie of alle the roundnesse of the firmament, and more zit 5 degrees and an half. Be the whiche I seye zou certeyny, that men may envirowne alle the erthe of alle the world, as wel undre as aboven, and turnen azen to his contree, that hadde companye and schippynge and conduyt: and alle weyes he scholde fynde men, londes, and yles, als wel as in this contree. For zee wyten welle, that thei that ben toward the Antartyk, thei ben streghte, feet azen feet of hem, that dwellen undre the transmontane; als wel as wee and thei that dwellyn undre us, been feet azenst feet. For alle the partie of see and of lond han here appositees, habitables or trepassables, and thei of this half and beond half. And wytethe wel, that aftre that, that I may perceve and compre-hende, the londes of Prestre John, emperour of Ynde ben undre us. For in goynge from Scotland or from England toward Jerusalem, men gon upward alwayes. For oure lond is in the lowe partie of the erthe, toward the West: and the lond or Prestre John is the low partie of the erthe, toward the Est: and thei han the day, whan wee have the nyghte, and also highe to the contrarie, thei han the nyghte, whan wee han the day. For the erthe and the see ben of round forme and schapp, as I have seyd befor. And than that men gon upward to o cost, men gon downward to another cost. Also zee have herd me seye, that Jerusalem is in the myddes of the world; and that may men preven and schewen there, be a sper, that is pighte in to the erthe, upon the hour of myddfay, whan it is equenoxium, that schewethe no schadwe on no syde. And that it scholde ben in the myddes of the world, David wytnessethe it in the Psautre, where he seythe, Deus operatus est salute in medio terre. Thanne thei that parten fro the parties of the West for to go toward Jerusalem, als many iorneyes as thei gon upward for to go thidre, in als many iorneyes may thei gon fro Jerusalem, unto other confynyces of the superficialtie of the erthe bezoonde. And when men go beonde tho iorunyes, towarde Ynde and to the forcyne yles, alle is envyronyng the roundnesse of the erthe and of the see, undre oure contrees on this half. And therefore hath he bc Fallen many tyme of o thing, that I have herd counh, whan I was zong; how a worthi man departed sometyme from our contrees, for to go serche the worlde. And so he passed Ynde, and the yles bezoonde Ynde, where ben mo than 5000 yles: and so longe he wente be see and lond, and so enviround the world be many seysons, that he fond an yle, where he herde speke his own langage, callynge on oxen in the plowgh, suche wordes as men spoken to bestes in his owne contree: whereof he hadde gret mervayle: for he knewe not how it myghte be. But I seye, that he had gon so longe, be londe and be see, that he had enviround alle the erthe, that he was comen azen envirowyng, that is to seve, goynge aboute, unto his owne marches, zif he wolde have passed forthe, til he had founden his contree and his owne knouleche. But he turned azen from thens, from whens he was come fro; and so he lost moche peynesulle labour, as him self seye, a gret while after, that he was comen hom. For it betelle aftre, that he wente in to Norwaye; and there temppest of the see toke him; and he arrayed in an yle; and when he was in that yle, he knew wel, that it was the yle where he had herd speke his owne langage before, and the callynge of the oxon at the plowgh: and that was possible thinge. But how it seemeth to symple men unlearned, that men ne move not gude the erthe, and also that men scholde falle toward the hevene, from undre! But that may not be, upon lesse, than wee move falle toward hevene, fro the erthe, where we ben. For fro what partie of the erthe that men duell, outher aboven or benethen, it semeth alwayes to hem that duell, that they gom more righte than any other folk. And righte as it semeth to us, that thei ben undre us, righte so it semeth hem, that weo ben undre hem. For zif a man myghte falle fro the erthe unto the firmament; be grettere resoun, the erthe and the see, that ben so grete and so hevy, scholde fallen to the firmament: but that may not be: and therfore seith the Lord God, Non timeas me, qui suspendi terra ex nichilo? And alle be it, that it be possible thing, that men may so enyroune alle the world, natheles of a 1000 persones, on ne myghte not happen to returnen to in his contree. For, for the gretnes of the erthe and of the see, men may goe a 1000 and a 1000 other wyes, that no man cowde reyde him perfetly toward the parties that he cam fro, but zif it were be adventure and happ, or be the grace of God. For the erthe is fulle large and fulle gret, and holt in roundnesse and aboute envyroun, be aboven and be benethen 20425 myles, affre the opynyoun of the old wise astronomers. And here seyenge I repreve noughte. But affre my lytulle wyte, it semeth me, savynghe here reverence, that it is more. And for to have betttere understandynge, I seye thus, be ther ymagyned a figure, that hath a gret compas; and aboute the poynt of the gret compas, that is clept the centre, be made another litille compas: than affre, be the gret compas devised be lines in manye parties; and that alle the lynes meeten at the centre; so that in als manye parties, as the gret compas schal be departed, in als manye, schalle be departed the litille, that is aboute the centre, alle be it, that the spaces ben lesse. Now thanne, be the gret compas represented for the firmament, and the litille compas represented for the erthe. Now thanne the firmament is devised, be astronomeres, in 12 signes; and every signe is devised in 30 degrees, that is 360 degrees, that the firmament hathe aboven. Also, be the erthe devised in als manye parties, as the firmament; and let every party answere to a degree of the firmament: and wytethe it wel, that affre the auctours of astronomy, 700 furlonges of erthe answeren to a degree of the firmament; and the ben 87 miles and 4 furlonges. Now be that here multiplied be 360 signes; and than thei ben 31250 myles, every of 8 furlonges, affre myles of oure contree. So moche hath the erthe in roundnesse, and of heigte envirowyn, affre my opynyoun and myn undirstondynge. And zee schulle undirstonde, that affre opynyoun of olnke wise philosophes and astronomeres, our contree ne Irelond ne Wales ne Scotland ne Norweye ne the other yles costynge to hem, ne ben not in the supercyylalte counted aboven the erthe; as it scheweth be alle the bokes of astronomye. For the supercilte of the erthe is departed in 7 partes, for the 7 planetes: and thopy partie ben clept clymates. And oure partes be not of the 7 clymates: for thei ben descedendye toward the West. And also these yles of Ynde, which beth evene azent us, beth noghte reckned in the clymates: for thei ben azent us, that ben in the lowe contree. And the 7 clymates strechen hem enyrounyynge the world.

II. And I John Maundeville knyghte aboveseyd, (alle thoughe I be unworthy) that departed from our contrees and passed the see, the zeer of grace 1322. that have passed manye londes and manye yles and contrees, and cerched manye fulle straunge places, and have ben in manye a fulle gode honourable company, and at manye a faire dede of armes, (alle be it that I dide none myself, for myn unable insuffisance) now I am come hom (mawgree my self) to reste; for gowtes, artetykes, that me disstreynen, tho diffynen the ende of my labour, azent my wille (God knoweth.) And thus takynge solace in my wrecche reste, recordynge the tyme passed, I have fulfilled these thinges and putte hem wryten in this boke, as it wolde come in to my mynde, the zeer of grace 1356 in the 34 zeer that I departedede from our contrees. Wherfore I preye to alle the reducers and hereres of this boke, zif it plese hem, that thei wolde preyen to God for me: and I schalle preye for hem. And alle tho that seyn for me a Pater noster, with an Ave Maria, that God forzeve me my synnes, I make hem partners and graunte em part of alle the gode pilgramynages and of alle the gode dedes, that I have don, zif ony be to his plesance: and noghte only of tho, but of alle that evere I schalle do unto my lyfes ende. The first of our authours, who can be properly said to have written English, was Sir John Gower, who, in his Confession of a Lover, calls Chaucer his disciple, and may therefore be considered as the father of our poetry.

NOWE for to speke of the commune,
It is to dreede of that fortune,

The history of our language is now brought to the point at which the history of our poetry is generally supposed to come, the time of the illustrious Geoffrey Chaucer, who may, perhaps, with great justice, be stiled the first of our versifiers who wrote poetically. He does not, however, appear to have deserved all the praise which he has received, or all the censure that he has suffered.
Dryden, who, mistaking genius for learning, and in confidence of his abilities, ventured to write of what he had not examined, ascribes to Chaucer the first refinement of our numbers, the first production of easy and natural rhymes, and the improvement of our language, by words borrowed from the more polished languages of the continent. Skinner con-trarily blames him in harsh terms for having vitiated his native speech by whole cartloads of foreign words. But he that reads the works of Gower will find smooth numbers and easy rhymes, of which Chaucer is supposed to have been the in-venter, and the French words, whether good or bad, of which Chaucer is charged as the importer.
Some improvements he might probably make, like others, in the infancy of our poetry, which the paucity of books does not allow us to discover with particular exactness; but the works of Gower and Lydgate sufficiently evince, that his diction was in general like that of his contemporaries; and some improvements he undoubtedly made by the various dispositions of his rhymes, and by the mixture of different numbers, in which he seems to have been happy and judicious. I have selected several specimens both of his prose and verse; and among them, part of his translation of Boetius; to which another version, made in the time of queen Mary, is opposed. It would be improper to quote very sparingly an author of so much reputation, or to make very large extracts from a book so generally known.

THE HISTORY OF THE

\[\text{den my waie, that is to saie, when I was exiled, thei that weren of my youth whilom welfull and green, conforten now sorrowfull wierdes of me olde man: for elde is comen unwarily upon me, hasted by the harnes that I have, and sorrow hath commanded his age to be in me. Heres hore aren shad overtimeliche upon my hed: and the slacke skinne tremblethe of mine empted bodie. Thilke deth of men is wellefull, that he ne cometh not in yeres that be swete, but cometh to wretches often icleped! Alas! alas! with how defe an ere deth cruell turneth aware fro wretches, and naeth for to close wepyng eyen. While fortune unfaithfull favoured me with light godes, that sorrowfull hourre, that is to saie, the deth, had almoste drent myne hedde: but now for fortune cloudie hath chaunged her decevable chere to mewarde, myne unpituous life draweth along ungreable dwellynges. O ye my frendes, what, or whereto auented ye me to ben welfull? For he that hath fallin, stode in no stedfast dege.}\\

IN the mean while, that I still record these thynges with my selfe, and marked my wepelle complainte with office of poinctell: I saugh stondyng aboven the hight of myn hed a woman of full grete reverence, by semblant. Her eyen brennyng, and clere, seyng over the common might of menne, with a lively colour, and with soche vigour and strength that it ne might not be nempned, all were it so, that she were full of so grete age, that menne wolden not trowne in no manere, that she were of our elde.

The stature of her was of doutous Judgemente, for sometyme she constrained and shronke her selven, like to the common mesure of menne: And sometyme it seemed, that she touched the heven with the hight of her hedde. And when she hove her hedde higher, she perced the self heven, so that the ses, do appoynt me, and compel me to writ these verses in meter, and the sorrowfull verses do wet my wretched face with very watterye teares, yssuing out of my eyes for sorowe. Whiche muses no feare without doute could overcome, but that they wold folow me in my journee of exile or banishment. Sometyme the ioye of happy and lustie delectable youth dyd comfort me, and newe the course of sorrowfull olde age causeth me to reioye. For hasty old age vnlooked for is come vpon me with al her incommodities and euyls, and sorowe hath commanded and broughte me into the same olde age, that is to say: that sorowe causeth me to be olde, before my time come of olde age. The hoer heares do growe vntimely vpon my heade, and my reuiled skyynne trembleth my flesh, cleane consumed and wasted with sorowe. Mannes death is happy, that cometh not in youth, when a man is lustye, and in pleasure or welth: but in time of aduersitie, when it is often desyred. Alas Alas howe dull and defie be the cares of cruel death vnto men in misery that would payne dye: and yet refusythe to come and shutte vp theyr carefull wepyng eyen. Whiles that false fortune fauoryed me with her transitory goodes, then the howre of death had almost overcome me. That is to say, death was reddy to oppresse me when I was in prosperitie. Nowe for by cause that fortune beyng turned, from prosperitie into aduersitie (as the clere day is darkyd with clouds) and hath chaunged her decevable countenaunce; my wretched life is yet prolonged, and doth continue in doleour. O my frendes, why hau ye so often hosted me, sayinge that I was happy when I had honour possessions riches, and autheritie whych be transitory thynges. He that hath fallen was in no stedfast dege.

WHYLES that I considerydde pryuylye with my selfe the thynges before sayd, and descrybed my wofull complaynte after the maner and office of a wrytter, me thought I sawe a woman stand ouer my head of a reverend countenaunce, hauyng quycke and glystering clere eye, aboue the common sorte of men in lyuely and delectable coloure, and ful of strength, although she semed so olde by no meanes she is thought to be one of this oure tyne, her stature is of douteful knowledge, for nowe she shewethe herselue at the common length or statu of men, and otherwys whiles she semeth so high, as though she touched heuen with the crown of her hed. And when she wold stretch fourth her hed hygher, it also perced thorough heauen, so that mens syght could not atteaine to behold the sight of menne lokynge was in yeell: her clothhes were made of right deile theredes, and subtyle workemanshipd, and of susteunce permanent, whych clothhes she had wyten with her owne hands, as I perceyued after her soule declaryng, and shewyng to me the beautie: The whiche clothhes a darkenes of a forleten and dispised elde had dymed and darked, as it is wone to darke by smoked images.

In the netherest hemme and border of these clothhes menne reede iworin therein a Grekishe A. that signifieth the life active, and above that letter, in the hiest bordure, a Grekishe C. that signifieth the life contemplative. And betwene these two letters there were seen degrees nobly wrought, in maner of ladders, by whiche degrees menne might climen from the netherest letter to the upperest: nathelesse handes of some men hadde krenve that cloth, by violence or by strength, and everich manne of them had borne awaie soche peces, as he might getten. And forsothe this forsaid woman bare smalle bokes in her right hande, and in her lefte hande she bare a scepter. And when she saw these Poetical muses approching about my bed, and endityng wordes to wyngynge, she was a little amoved, and glowed with cruel eyen. Who (q? she) hath suffered approch to this sike manne these commen stormpettes, of which is the place that menne called Theatre, the whiche onely ne asswaghen not his sorowes with remedies, but thei would fenden and norish hym with swete venime. Forsothe, that ben tho that with thornes, and prickynge of talentes of afflications, whiche that ben nothyng fructuous nor profitable, distroen the Corne, plentifuls of fruites of reson. For thei holden hertes of men in usage, but thei ne deliver no folke fro maladie. But if ye muses had withdrawn fro me with your flatteries any unconnynge and unprofitable manne, as ben wone to finde commenly among the peple, I would well suffer the lasse grevolus. For why, in soche an unprofitable man nyne entes were nothyng endamaged. But ye withdrawn fro me this man, that hath ben nourished in my studies or scoles of Eleaticis, and of Academicis in Greke. But goeth now rather awaie ye Mermaidens, whiche that ben swete, till it be at the last, and sufrieth this man to be cured and heled by my muses, that is to say, by my notefull sciences. And thus this companie of muses ilumen casten worthly the chere downdward to the yerth, and shewing by rednesse ther shame, thei passeden sorowfully the threshold. And I of whom the sight plonged in teres was darked, so that I ne might not know what that woman was, of so Imperial behold her. Her vestures or clothes were perfyt of the finyste theredes, and subtyle workemanshipd, and of susteunce permanent, whych clothtes she had wyten with her owne hands as I perceyued after her owne saynyng. The kynde or beawtye of the whiche vestures, a certayne darkenes or rather ignorance of oldenes forgotten hadde obscuryd and darkened, as the smoke is wont to darke images that stand nyghe the smoke. In the lower part of the said vestures was read the Greke letter P. wone whych signifieth practise or actyfe, and in the hygher parte of the vestures the Greke letter T. whych estandeth for theoria, that signifieth speculacion or contemplacion. And betwene both the sayd letters were sene certayne degrees, wroght after the maner of ladders, wherein was as it were a passage or waye in steppes or degrees from the lower part wher the letter P. was which is vnderstand from practys or actyfe, unto the hygher parte wher the letter T. was whych is vnderstand speculacion or contemplacion. Neuertheles the handes of some yvolente persones had cut the sayde vestures and had taken awaye certayne pecis thereof, such as any one could catch. And she her selfe dyd bare in her ryght hande litel bokes, and in her lefte hande a scepter, which foresayd philosophie (when she saw the muses poetical present at my bed, spekyng sorowful wordes to my wyngynge) beyng angry sayd (with terrible or frownynge countenance) who suffred these crafty harlotis to com to thys sycke man? whych can help hym by no means of hys grefe by any kind of medicines, but rather increase the same with swete poysen. These bee they that doo dystroye the fertile and plentious commodytys of reason and the fruytes thereof wyth their prckynge thornes, or barren affectes, and accustomed or subdue mens myndes with sickenes, and heuyynes, and do not deluyer or heale them of the same. But yf your flatterye had comued or withdrawn from me, any vulernyd man as the comen sorte of people are wone to be, I coulde haue ben better contentyd, for in that my worke shoulde not be hurt or hynderyd. But you haue taken and comued from me thys man that hath ben broughte vp in the studyes of Aristotel and of Plato. But yet get you hence maremaids (that some swete untill you haue brought a man to death) and suffer me to heale thys my man wyth my muses or scyences that be holsome and good. And after that philosophie had spoken these wordes the sayd companie of the musys poetical beyng rebukyd and sad, caste down their countenance to the grounde, and by blussyng confessed their shamfastness.

perial authoritie, I wexe all abashed and stonied, and cast my sight downe to the yerth, and began still for to abide what she would done afterward. Then came she nere, and set her downe upon the utterest corner of my bed, and she beholding my chere, that was cast to the yerth, hevie and grevous of wepyng, complained with these words (that I shall saine) the perturbation of my thought.

The conclusions of the Astrolabie.

This book, (written to his son in the year of our Lord 1391, and in the 14 of King Richard II.) standeth so good at this day, especially for the horizon of Oxenforde, as in the opinion of the learned it cannot be amended, says an Edit. of Chaucer.

LYTEL Lovys my sonne, I percewe well by certaine evidences thyne ablyte to lerne scyences, touching nombres and proportiones, and also well consyder I thy besye prayer in especyale to lerne the tretys in the astrolabye. Than for as moche as a philosopher saith, he wrapeth hym in his freund, that condysendeth to the ryghtfull prayers of his freund: therefore I have given the a sufficient astrolabye for our orizont, compownded after the latitute of Oxenforde: upon the whiche by mediacion of this lytell tretise, I purpose to teche the a certaine nombre of conclusions, certaynyng to this same instrument. I say a certaine nombre of conclusions for three cause, the first cause is this. Truste wel that al the conclusions that have be founden, or ells possibyle might be founde in so noble an instrument as in the astrolabye, ben unknowen perfected to anye mortall man in this region, as I suppose. Another cause is this, that sothely in any cartes of the astrolabye that I have ysene, ther ben some conclusions, that wol not in al thinges perfourme ther behestes: and some of hem ben to harde to thy tender age of ten yere to concewe. This tretise divyed in five partes, wil I shewe the wonde light rules and naked wordes in Englishe, for Latyne ne canst thou nat yet but smale, my litel sonne. But nevertheless suffiseth to the thes trewe conclusions in Englishe, as well as suffiseth to these noble clerkes Grekes these same conclusions in Greke, and to the Arabines in Arabike, and to the Jewes in Hebrewe, and to the Latin folke in Latyn: whiche Latyn folke had hem shamanstines, and went out of the dores. But I (that had my syght dull and blynd wyth wepyng, so that I knew not what woman this was hauing soo great authoritie) was amasyd or astonyed, and lopyng downeward, towarde the grounde, I began pryvylye to look what thynge she would saye feren, then she had said. Then she approching and drayynge nere vnsto me, sat downe upon the vtermost part of my bed, and lopyng vpon my face sad with wepyng, and declynyd toward the earth for sorow, bewayled the trouble of my minde wyth these sayynges folowyng:

firste out of other divers langages, and write hem in their owne tongue, that is to saine in Latine.

And God wote that in all these langages and in manye mo, have these conclusyons ben suffiencyly lerned and taught, and yet by divers rules, right as divers pathes leden divers folke the right wyne to Rome.

Now wol I pray mely every person discrete, that redeth or hereth this lyttel tretise to have my rude ententing excused, and my superfluite of wordes, for two causes. The first cause is, for that curious endityng and harde sentences is ful hevy at ones, for soch a childe to lerne. And the seconde cause is this, that sothely me semeth better to written unto a childe twise a gode sentence, that he foriete it ones. And, Lowis, if it be so that I shewe the in my lyt Engrish, as trewe conclusions touching this mater, and not only as trewe but as many and subtil conclusions as ben yshewed in Latin, in any comon tretise of the astrolabye, comme me the more thanke, and praye God save the kinge, that is lorde of this langage, and all that him saith bereth, and obieth everycice in his degree, the more and the lasse. But consydrth wel, that I ne usurpe not to have founden this werke of my labour or of myne engin. In ame but a leude compilatour of the laboure of olde astrologiens, and have it translated in myn Engrish onely for thy doctrine: and with this swerde shal I slene envy.

The first party.

The first partye of this tretise shal reherse the figures, and the membres of thyne astrolabye, bycause that thou shalt have the greter knowinge of thine owne instrument.

The seconde party.

The seconde partye shal teche the to werken the very practike of the foresaid conclusions, as ferforthe and also narowe as may be shewed in so smale an instrument portative aboute. For well wote every astrologen, that smallest fractions ne wol not be shewed in so smal an instrument, as in subtil tables calculated for a cause.

The Prologue of the Testament of LOVE.

MANY men ther ben, that with eres openly spred so moche swallowen the deliciousnesse of jestes and of ryme, by queint knittinge colours, that of the godenesse or of the badnesse of the sentence take they litel hede or else none.

Sothelye dulc witte and a thoughtfulle soule so sore have mined and graffed in my spirites, that soche craft of endittinge woll nat ben of mine acquaintance. And for rude wordes and boistous percen the herte of the herer to the inrest point, and planten there the sentence of thinges, so that with litel helpe it is able to spring, this boke, that nothinge hath of the grete flode of wytte, ne of semelyche colours, is dolven with rude wordes and boistous, and so drawe togeter to maken the catchers therof ben the more redy to hent sentence.

Some men there ben, that painten with colours riche and some with wers, as with red inke, and some with coles and chalke: and yet is there gode matter to the leude peple of thylyke chalkye purtreytue, as 'hem thinketh for the time, and afterward the syght of the better colours yeven to 'hem more joye for the first leudenesse. So sothly this leude clowyd occupacion is not to prayse, but by the leude, for comenly leude leudenesse commendeth. Eke it shall yeve sight that other precyous thynges shall be the more in reverence. In Latin and French hath many soveraine wittes had grete delyte to endite, and have mady noble thinges fulfilde, but certes there ben some that speken ther poise mater in Frenche, of whiche speche the Frenche men have as gode a santasye as we have in herys of Frenche mens Enlishe. And many termes there ben in Englyshe, whiche unmeth we English men conen declare the knowleginge; howe should than a Frenche man borne? soche termes conenjumper in his mater, but as the jay chatereth Enlishe. Right so truely the understandyn of Englishmen woll not strethe to the privie termes in Frenche, what so ever we bosten of strange langage. Let then clerkes enditen in Latin, for they have the propertie of science and the knowinge in that facultie: and let Frenche men in ther Frenche also enditen ther queint termes, for it is kyndely to ther mouthes; and let us shewe our fantasies in such wordes as we lerneden of our dame's tongue. And although this boke be lytel thank worthy for the leudenesse in travaile, yet soch writing exiten men to thylyke thinges that ben necessarie; for every man thereby may as by a perpetual inyrrour sene the vices or virtues of other, in whiche thyngye lightly may be conceived to eschue perils, and necessaries to catch, after as aventures have fallen to other pepole or persons.

Certes the soverainst thinges of desire and most creture resonable, have or elshould have full appettite to ther perfeccion: unreasonoble bestes mowne not, sithe resonable hath in 'hem no workinge: than resonable that wol not, is comparisoned to unresoznable, and made lyke 'hem. Forsothe the most soveraine and finall perfeccion of man is in knowynge of a sothe, withouten any entent deceivable, and in love of one very God, that is inchaungene, that is to knowe, and love his creature.

Nowe principally the mene to bryngye in knowleginge and lowynge his creature, is the consideracyon of thynges made by the creature, wher through by thylyke thinges that ben made, understandynghe here to our wytttes, arne the unsene pryvities of God made to us syghtfull and knowinge, in our contemplacion and understandinge. These thinges than forsothe moche bringen us to the ful knowleginge sothe, and to the pryvitye love of the maker of hevenly thinges. Lo! David saith: thou hast delited me in makinge, as who saith, to have delite in the tyme how God hat lent me in consideracion of thy makinge. Wherof Aristotle in the boke de Animalibus, saith to naturell philosophers: it is a grete likynge in love of knowinge ther creture: and also in knowinge of causes in kyndelye thynges, consiyrde forsothe the formes of kyndelye thynges and the shap, a grete kyndelye love we shuld have to the werkman that 'hem made. The crafte of a werkman is shewed in the werk. Herefore truile the philosophers with a lvyly studie manie noble thinges, righte precious, and worthy to memore, witten, and by a grete swet and travaile to us laften of causes the properties in natures of thinges, to whiche therfore philosophers it was more joy, more lykinge, more herty lust in kindely vertues and matters of reson the perfeccion by busy study to knowe, than to have had all the tresour, al the richesse, al the vaine glory, that the passed emperours, princes, or kynges hadden. Therfore the names of 'hem in the boke of perpetuell memorie in vertue and pece arne witten; and in the contrarie, that is to in Styxe the foule pitte of helde arne thiylke pressed that soch godenes hated. And bicause this boke shall be of love, and the prime causes of stereng in that doinge with passions and diseses for wantinge of desire, I will that this boke be cleped the testament of love.
But nowe thou reder, who is thilke that will not in scorne laughe, to here a dwarfe or els halfe a man, say he will rende out the swordes of Hercules handes, and also he shulde set Hercules Gades a mile yet farther, and over that he had power of strength to pull up the spere, that Alisander the noble myght never wage, and that passinge al thinges to ben mayster of Fraunce by might, there as the noble gracious Edwarde the thirde for al his grete prowesse in victories ne might al ye conquer?

Certes I wote well, ther shall be made more scorne and jape of me, that I so unworthyly clothed altogether in the clownde cloudes of unconning, wilt putten me in prees to speke of love, or els of the causes in that matter, sithen al the gratest clerkes han had ynoth to don, and as saith gathered up clenue toforne hem, and with ther sharp sithes of conning al mowen and made therof grete rekes and noble, ful of al preties to fede me and many an other. Envye forsothe commendeth noughte his reson, that he hathe in hain, be it never so trusty. And although these noble reperes, as gode workmen and worthy ther hir, han al draw and bounte up in the shevres, and made many shockes, yet have I ensample to gather the smale crommes, and fullin ma walet of tho that falled from the bourde among the smalle houndes, notwithstanding the travaile of the maiger, that hath draw up in the cloth al the remissailles, as trenchours, and the relefe to bere to the almesse. Yet also here I leve of the noble husbande Boece, although I be a straungre of conninge to come after his doctrine, and these grete workmen, and glene my handfuls of the shelyngge after ther handes, and yf me faile ought of my ful, to encrease my porcion with that I shal drawe by privyties out of shockes; a slye servauntes in his owne helpe is often moche commendeg; knowynge of trouthe in causes of thynge was more hardier in the firste secheris, and so sayth Aristotle, and lighter in us that han folowed after. For ther passing study han freshed our wittes, and oure understandynge han excited in consideracion of trouthe by sharpenes of ther resonys. Utterly these thinges be no dremes ne japes, to throwe to hoggges, it is lyfelych mete for children of trouthe, and as they me betiden when I pilgrimed out of my kith in wintere, when the wether out of mesure was boistous, and the wyld wynd Boreas, as his kind asketh, with dryninge coldes maked the waves of the ocean se so to arise unkindely over the commune barrenes that it was in point to spill all the erthe.

The Prologues of the Canterbury Tales of CHaucer, from the MSS.

WHEN that Aprilis with his shouris sote,
The droughte of March had percid to the rote,
And bathed every yeyn in such licour,
Of which vertue engendrid is the flour.
When Zephyrus eke, with his swete breth
Espirid hath, in every holt and heth
The tender croppis; and that the yong Sunn
Hath in the Ram in his halve cours yrunn:
And smalè foules makyn melodye,
That Slepe allè night with opin eye,
(So prickith them nature in ther corage)
Then longin folk to go on pilgrimage:
And palmeris for to sekin strange strondes,
To servyn hallowes couth in sondry londes:
And specially fro every shiris end
Of Englen, to Canterbury they wend,
The holy blissfull martyr for to seke,
That them hath holpyn, whan that they were seke.

Befall that in that seson on a day
In Southwerk at the Tabberd as I lay,
Redy to wendyn on my pilgrimage
To Canterbury, with devote corage,
At night wer come into that hostery
Wele nine and twenty in a company
Of sundrye folk, by aventur yfall
In felaship: and pilgrimes wer they all:
That toward Canterbury wouldyn ride.

The chambers and the stablis werin wide,
And well we weryn esid at the best:
And shortly when the sunne was to rest,
So had I spokyn with them everych one,
That I was of ther felaship anone;
And madè forward erli for to rise,
To take our weye, ther as I did devise.

But nathless while that I have time and space,
Er' that I farther in this talè pace,
Methinkith it accordaunt to reson,
To tell you allè the condition
Of ech of them, so as it semid me,
And which they werin, and of what degree,
And eke in what array that they wer in;
And at a knight then woll I first begin.

The Knight.

A knight ther was, and that a worthy man,
That fro the timè that he first began
To ridin out, he lovd Chevalrie,
Trouth and honour, fredome and curtesy.
Full worthy was he in his lordis werre,
And thereto had he riddin nane more ferre
As well in Christendom, as in Hethness;
And evyr honoured for his worthiness.
At Alessandre he was whan it was won;
Full oft timis he had the bord begun
Abavin alle nacionys in Pruce;
In Letow had he ridden, and in Luce,
No Christen-man so oft of his degree
In Granada; in the sege had he be
Of Algezir, and ridd in Belmary;
At Leyis was he, and at Sataly,
Whan that they wer won; and in the grete see
At many a noble army had he be:
At mortal battails had he ben fiftene,
And foughtin for our feith at Tramcesene,
In listis thrys, and alwey slein his fo.
This ilke worthy knight had been also Sometinis with the lord of Palathy,
Ayens anothir hethlin in Turky;
And evirmore he had a sov'ran prize;
And though that he was worthy, he was wise;
Of his port as meke as is a maid,
Ne nevir yet no villany he said
In all his life unto no manner wight:
He was a very parfit gentil knight.
But for to tellyn you of his array,
His hors wer good; but he was nothing gay,
Of fustian he werid a gipon,
Allè besmottrid with his haburgen.
For he was late ycome from his viage,
And wentè for to do his pilgrimage.

The House of FAME.
The First Boke.

NOW herken, as I have you saied,
What that I mette or I abraied,
Of December the teneith daie,
When it was night, to slepe I laie,
Right as I was wont for to doen,
And fill aslepè wondir sone,
As he that was werie forgo
On pilgrimagè milis two
To the corps of sainct Leonarde,
To makin lith that erst was harde.

But as me slept me mette I was Within a temple' imade of glas,
In whiche there werin mo images
Of golde, standyng in sondrie stages,
Sette in mo riche tabirnacles,
And with perrè mo pinnacles,
And mo curious portairitus,
And queint manir of figuris
Of golde worke, then I sawe evyr.

But certainly I n'ist nevir
Where that it was, but well wist I
It was of Venus redily
This temple, for in purtreiture
I sawe anone right her figure
Nakid yfletyn in a se,
And also on her hedde parde
Her rosy garland white and redde,
And her combe for to kemeber her hedde,
Her davis, and Dan Cupido
Her blindè sonne, and Vulcano,
That in his face ywas full brune.

But as I romid up and doune,
I founde that on the wall there was Thus writtn on a table' of bras.
I woll now syng, if that I can,
The armis, and also the man,
That first came through his destine
Fugitife fro Troye the countre
Into Italie, with full moche pine,
Unto the strondis of Lavine,
And tho began the storie' anone,
As I shall tellin you echone.

First sawe I the distracioon
Of Troie, thorough the Greke Sinon,
With his false untrue forswerynges,
And with his chere and his lesynges,
That made a horse, brought into Troye,
By whiche Trojans loste all their joye.

And after this was graved, alas!
How Ilians castill assailed was,
And won, and kyng Priamus alas,
And Polites his sonne certain,
Dispitosly of Dan Pyrhrus.

And next that sawe I howe Venus,
When that she sawe the castill brende,
Doune from hevin she gan discende,
And bade her sonne Æneas fle,
And how he fled, and how that he Escapid was from all the pres,
And toke his fathre', old Anchises,
And bare hym on his back awaie,
Crying alas and welawaie!
The which Anchises in his hande,
Bare tho the goddis of the lande
I mene thilke that unbrennid were.

Then sawe I next that all in fere
How Creusa, Dan Æneas wife,
Whom that he lovid all his life,
And her yong sonne clepid Julo,
And eke Ascanius also,
Fleddin eke, with full dreeere chere,
That it was pite for to here,
And in a forest as thei went How at a tournyng of a went Creusa was iostete, alas!
That rede not I, how that it was
How he her sought, and how her ghoste
Bad hym to fite the Grceks hoste,
And saide he must into Italie,
As was his destinie, sauns faile,
That is was pitie for to here,
When that her spirite gan appere
The wordis that she to hym saide,
And for to kepe her some hym praised.

There saide I graven eke how he
His fathir eke, and his meyne,
With his shippis began to saile
Toward the countrie of Italie,
As streight as ere they might go.

There sawe I eke the, cruel Juno,
That art Dan Jupiter his wife,
That hase liated all thy life
Merciless all the Trojan blode,
Rennin and crie as thou were wode
On Æolus, the god of windes,
To blowin out of allè kindes
So loudè, that he should ydrenche
Lorde, and ladie, and grome, and wenche
Of all the Trojanis nacion,
Without any’ of their salvacion.

There sawe I soche tempest arise,
That evry herte might agrise,
To se it paintid on the wall.

There saide I eke gravin withall,
Venus, how ye, my ladie dere,
Ye wepyng with full woful chere Yprayid Jupiter on he,
To save and kepyn that navie
Of that dere Trojan Æneas,
Sithens that he your sonne ywas.

Gode counsaile of Chaucre.

FLIE fro the prese and dwell with soothesmesse, Suffise unto thy gode though it be small,
For horde hath hate, and climbyng tikinesse,
Prece hath envie, and wele it brent oer all,
Savour no more then the behovin shall,
Rede well thy self, that othir folke canst rede,
And trouthe the shall delivir it is no drede.
Paiene the not ech e crokide to redresse,
In trust of her that toomith as a balle,
Grete rest standith in litel businesse,
Beware also to spurned against a nalle,
Strive not as dooth a crocke with a walle,
Demith thy self that demith othr’s dede.

And trouthe the shall deliver it is no drede.
That the is sent receve in buxomenesse;
The wrastlyng of this worde asketh a fall.
Here is no home, here is but wildrenesse,
For thee pilgrim, for the best out of thy stall,
Loke up on high, and thanke thy God of all,
Weith thy taste and let thy ghoste the lede,
And trouthe the shall deliver it is no drede.

Balade of the village without paintyng.

THIS wretchid worlde is transmutacion
As wele and wo, nowe pore, and nowe honour,
Without ordir or due discrecion
Governed is by fortune’s errour,
But nathëlesse the lacke of her favour
Ne maie not doe me syngh though that I die,
J’ay tout perdu, mon temps & mon labour
For finally fortune I doe defie,
Yet is me left the sight of my resoun
To knowyn frie fœ foœ in thy mirrour,
So moche hath yet thy tournyng up and doun
I taughtin me to knowyn in an hour,
But trulie no force of thy redour
To hym that ovir hysmsel hath maistrie,
My suffisaunce yshal be my succour,
For finally fortune I do defie.

O Socrates, thou stedfast champion,
She ne might nevir be thy turmentour,
Thou nevir dredest her oppression,
Ne in her chere foundin thou no favour,
Thou knowe wele the discipt of her colour,
And that her moste worship is for to lie,
I knowe her eke a false dissimulour.
For finally fortune I do defie.

The answere of Fortune.

NO man is wretchid but hymself it wene,
He that yhath hymself hath suffisaunce,
Why sauest thou that I am to the so kene,
That hast thy self out of my governaunce?
Saide thus grant mercie of thin habunsaunce,
That thou hast lent or this, thou shalt not strive,
What wost thou yet how I the wolle avance?
And eke thou hast thy bestè frende alive.

Let not this man and me thus crie and plain,
And I shall quitin you this businesse,
And if ye liste releve hym of his pain,
Praie ye his best frende of his noblenesse
That to some betther state he maie attain.

Lydgate was a monk of Bury, who wrote about the same time with Chaucer. Out of his prologue to his third book of The Fall of Princes a few stanzas are selected, which, being compared with the style of his two contemporaries, will show that our language was then not written by caprice, but was in a settled state.

LIKE a pilgrime which that goeth on foot, And hath none horse to relieue his travayle, Howte, drye and very, and may finde no bote Of wel cold whan thrust doth hym assayle Wine nor licour, that may to him auayle, Right so fare I which in my businesse, No succour fynde my rudenesse to redresse. I meane as thus, I have no fresh licour Out of the conduites of Calliope, Nor through Clio in rhetorike no floure, In my labour for to refresh me Nor of the susters in number thrise three, Which with Cithera on Parnaso dwell, They never me gagne drinke once of their wel. Nor of theuy springes clere and christline, That sprange by touchyng of the Pegase, Their fauour lacketh my making ten lumine I fynde theuy bawme of so great scarcitie, To tame theuy tunnes with some drop of plentie For Poliphemus through his great blindnes, Hath in me derked of Argos the brightnes. Fortescue was chief justice of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of king Henry VI. He retired in 1471, after the battle of Tewkesbury, and probably wrote most of his works in his privacy. The following passage is selected from his book.
THE HISTORY OF THE

of The Difference between an absolute and limited Monarchy.

HYT may peradventure be marveled by some men, why one Realme is a Lordship only Royall, and the Pryncethe thereof rulyth yt by his Law, called Jus Regale; and another Kyngdome is a Lordship, Royall and Politike, and the Prince thereof rulyth by a Lawe, called Jus Politicum & Regale; sythen thes two Princes both of egall Astate.

To this dowte it may be answeryd in this maner; The first Institution of thes twoo Realmys, upon the Incorporation of them, is the cause of this diversyte.

When Nembrath by Myght, for his owne Glorye, made and incorporate the first Realme, and subdyed it to hymself by Tyrannye, he would not have it governyd by any other Rule or Lawe, but by his owne Will; by which and for th' accomplishment thereof he made it. And therfor, though he had thus made a Realme, holy Scripture denyd to cal hym a Kyng, Quia Rex dicitur a Regendo; Which thyng he dyd not, but oppressyd the People by Myght, and therfore he was a Tyrant, and callid Primus Tyrannorum. But holy Writ callith hym Robustus Venator coram Deo. For as the Hunter takyth the wyld beste for to scle and eate hym; so Nembrath subdyed to him the People with Myght, to have their service and their goods, using upon them the Lordship that is callid Dominium Regale tantium. After hym Belus that was callid first a Kyng, and after hym his Sone Nynus, and after hym other Panyss; They, by Example of Nembrath, made them Realmys, would not have them rulyd by other Lawys than by their own Will. Which Lawys ben right good under good Princes; and their Kyngdoms a then most resemblyd to the Kyngdome of God, which reynith upon Man, rulyng him by hys own Will. Wherfor many Crystyn Princes usen the same Lawe; and therfor it is, that the Lawys sayen, Quod Principi placuit Leges habet vigorem. And thus I suppose first beganne in Realmys, Dominium tantium Regale. But afterward, when Mankynd was more mansuete, and better disposyd to Vertue, Grete Communalties, as was the Feliship, that came into this Lond with Brute, wyllyng to be unyed and made a Body Politique callid a Realme, havyng an Heed to governe it; as after the Saying of the philosopher, every Communalty unyed of many parts must needs have an heed; than they chose the same Brute to be their Heed and Kyng. And they and he upon this Incorporation and Institution, and onyng of themself into a Realme, ordeynyd the same Realme so to be rulyd and justyfyd by such Lawys, as they al would assent unto; which Lawe therefor is callid Politicum; and bycause it is mynystryd by a Kyng, it is callid Regale. Dominium Politicum dicitur quasi Regimen, plurium Scientia, sive Consilio ministratum. The Kyng of Scotts reynith upon his People by his Lawe, videlicet, Regimine Politico & Regali. And as Diodorus Syculs saith, in his Boke de priscis Historiis, The Realme of Egypte is rulyd by the same Lawe, and therfor the King therof chaungith not his Lawes, without the Assent of his People. And in like forme as he saith is rulyd the Kyngdome of Saba, in Felici Arabia, and the Lond of Libie; And also the more parte of al the Realmys in Afrike. Which manner of Rule and Lordship, the sayd Diodorus in that Boke, praysith gretyly. For it is not only good for the Prince, that may thereby the more sewery do Justice, than by his owne Arbitriment; but it is also good for his People that receyve therby, such Justice as they desyer themself. Now as nie seynyth, it ys showyd opinly nough, why one Kyng rulyth and reynith on his People Dominio tantium Regali, and that other reynith Domino Politico & Regali: For that one Kyngdom beganne, of and by, the Might of the Prince, and that other beganne, by the Desier and Institution of the People of the same Prince.

Of the works of Sir Thomas More it was necessary to give a large specimen, both because our language was then in a great degree formed and settled, and because it appears from Ben Jonson, that his works were considered as models of pure and elegant style. The tale, which is placed first, because earliest written, will show what an attentive reader will, in persuing our old writers, often remark, that the familiar and colloquial part of our language, being diffused among those classes who had no ambition of refinement, or affectation of novelty, has suffered very little change. There is another reason why the extracts from this author are more copious: his works are carefully and correctly printed, and may therefore be better trusted than any other edition of the English books of that, or the preceding ages.
A merry jest how a sergeant would learne to playe the frere, Written by maister Thomas
More in hys youth.

WYSE men alway,
Affyrme and say,
That best is for a man:
Diligently,
For to apply,
The business that he can,
And in no wyse,
To enterpryse,
An other faculte,
For he that wyll,
And can no skyll,
Is neuer lyke to the.
He that hath lathe,
The hosiers crafte,
And falleth to making shone,
The smythe that shall,
To payntyng fall,
His thrift is well nigh done.
A blacke draper,
With whyte paper,
To goe to writyng scole,
An olde butler,
Becum a cutler,
I wen shal proue a folke.
And an olde trott,
That can I wot.
Nothynge but kisse the cup,
With her phisick,
Wile kepeth one sicke,
Tyll she have soued hym vp.
A man of lawe,
That neuer sawe,
The wayes to bye and sell,
Wenyng to ryse,
By marchaundise,
I wish to speede hym well.
A marchaunt eke,
That wyll go seke.
By all the meanes he may,
To fall in sute,
Tyll he dispute,
His money clene away,
Pletynge the lawe,
For euer strawe,
Shall proue a thrifty man,
With bate and strife,
But by my life,
I cannot tell you whan.

When an hatter
Wyll go smatter,
In philosophy,
Or a pedlar
Ware a medlar,
In theology,
All that ensue,
Sche crafte new,
That drive so farre a cast,
That euermore,
They do therfore,
Beshrewe themselfe at last.
This thing was tried
And verefyed,
Here by a sergeant late,
That thrifty was,
Or he coulde pas,
Rapped about the pate,
Whyle that he would See howe he could,
A little play the frere:
Now ye you wyll,
Knowe howe it fyll,
Take hede and ye shall here.
It happened so,
Not long ago,
A thrifty man there dyed,
An hundred pounde,
Of nobles rounde,
That had he layd a side:
His sonne he wolde,
Should haue this golde,
For to beginne with all:
But to suflise
His chylde, well thrisse,
That money was to smal,
Yet or this day
I have hard say,
That many a man certesse,
Hath with good cast,
Be ryche at last,
That hath begonne with lesse.
But this yonge manne,
So well beganne,
His money to employ,
That certainly,
His policy.
To see it was a joy,
For lest sum blast,
Myght over cast,
His ship, or by mischaunce,
Men with sum wile,
Myght hym begyle,
And minish his subsaunce,

For to put out,
Al maner dout,
He made a good puruay,
For every whyt,
By his owne wyt,
And toke an other way:
First fayre and wele,
Therof much dele,
He dydged it in a pot,
But them him thought,
That way was nought,
And there he left it not.
So was he faine,
From thence agayne,
To put it in a cup,
And by and by,
Coutously,
He supped it fayre vp,
In his owne brest,
He thought it best,
His money to enclose,
Then wist he well,
What euer fell,
He coulde not neuer lose.
He borrowed then,
Of other men,
Money and marchaundise:
Nauer payd it,
Up he laid it,
In like maner wyse.
Yet on the gere,
That he would were,
He reight not what he spent,
So it were nyce,
As for the price,
Could him not miscontent.
With lusty sporte,
And with resort,
Of illy company,
In mirth and play,
Full many a day,
He linded merelie.
And men had sworne,
Some men is borne,
To haue a lucky howre,
And so was he,
For such degre,
He gat and suche honour,
That without dout,
When he went out,
A sergeant well and fayre,
Was rody straye,
On him to wayte,
As sone as on the mayre.
But he doubllesse,
Of his mekenesse,
Hated such pompe and pride,
And would not go,
Companied so,
But drewe himself a side,
To saint Katharine,
Straight as a line,
He gate him at a tyde,
For deucicion,
Or promociion,
There would he nedes abyde.
There spent he fast,
Till all were past,
And to him came there meny,
To aske their det,
But none could get,
The valour of a peny.
With visage stout,
He bare it out,
Euen vnto the harde hedge,
A mouth or twaine,
Tyll he was fayne,
To laye his gowne to pledge.
Than was he there,
In greater feare,
Than ere that he came thither,
And would as fayne,
Depart againe,
But that he wist not whither.
Than after this,
To a frende of his,
He went and there abode,
Where as he lay,
So sick alway,
He myght not come abrode.
It happed than,
A marchaunt man,
That he ought money to,
Of an officere,
That gan enquere,
What him was best to do.
And he answerde,
Be not aferde,
Take an accion therfore,
I you beheste,
I shall hym reste,
And than care for no more.
I feare quod he,
It wyll not be,
For he wyll not come out.
The sergeaunt said,
Be not afayd,
It shall be brought about.

In many a game,
Lyke to the same,
Have I bene well in vre,
And for your sake,
Let me be bake,
But if I do this cure.
Thus part they both,
And forth then goth,
A pace this officere,
And for a day,
All his array,
He chaunged with a frene.
So was he dight,
That no man might,
Hym for a frene deny,
He dopped and dooked,
He spake and looked,
So religiously.
Yet in a glasse,
Or he would passe.
He toted and he peered,
His harte for pryde,
Lephe in his syde
To see how well he freered.
Than forth a pace,
Unto the place,
He gooth withouten shame
To do this dede,
But now take hede
For here begynneth the game.
He drew hym ny,
And softely,
Streight at the dore he knocked:
And a damsell,
That hard hym well,
There came and it unlocked.
The frene sayd
Good spece fayre mayd,
Here lodgeth such a man,
It is told me:
Well sry quod she,
And yf he do what than.
Quod he maystresse,
No harm doutlesse:
It longeth for our order,
To hurt no man,
But as we can,
Euer wight to forder.
With hym truly,
Fayne speake would I,
Syr quod she by my fay,
He is so sike,
Ye be not lyke,
To speake with hym to day.

Quod he fayre may,
Yet I you pray
This much at my desire.
Vouchesafe to do,
As go hym to,
And say an austen frene
Would with hym speake,
And matters breake,
For his auayle certayn.
Quod she I wyll,
Stonde ye here styll,
Tyll I come downe agayn.
Vp is she go,
And told hym so,
As she was bode to say,
He mistrustyng,
No maner thyng,
Said mayden go thy way
And fetch him hyder,
That we togyder,
May talk. A downe she gothe,
Vp she hym brought,
No harme she thought,
But it made some folke wrot.
This officere,
This fayned frene,
When he was come aloft,
He dopped than,
And greteth this man,
Religiously and oft.
And he agayn,
Rytgh glad and fayn,
Toke hym there by the hand.
The frene than sayd,
Ye be dismawy,
With trouble I understande.
In dede quod he,
It hath with me,
Bene better than it is.
Syr quod the frene,
Be of good chere,
Yet shall it after this.
But I would now,
Comen with you,
In counsayle yf you please,
Or ellys nat
Of matters that Shall set your heart at ease.
Downe went the mayd,
The marchaunt sayd,
Now say on gentile frene,
Of thyss tyding,
That ye me bryng,
I long full sore to here.

When there was none,
But they alone,
  The frere with ouyll grace,
Sayd, I rest the,
Come on with me,
  And out he toke his mace:
Thou shalt obey,
Come on thy way,
  I have the in my clouche,
Thou goest not hence,
For all the pense,
  The mayre hath in his pouche.
This marchaunt there,
For wrath and fere,
  He waxyng wellyng wood,
Sayd horson thefe,
With a mischeif,
  Who hath taught the thy good.
And with his fist,
Vpon the lyst,
  He gave hym such a blow,
That backward downe,
Almost in sowne,
  The frere is ouerthrow.
Yet was this man,
Well fearder than,
  Lest he the frere had slayne,
Tyll with good rappes,
And hevy clappes,
  He dawde hym vp agayne.
The frere took harte,
  And vp he starte,
  And well he layde about,
And so there goth,
Betwene them both,
  Many a lusty clout.

A rufal lamentacion (written by master Thomas More in his youth) of the deth of queene Elisabeth mother to king Henry the eight, wife to king Henry the seuenthe, and eldest daughter to king Edward the fourth, which queene Elisabeth dyed in childbed in February in the yere of our Lord 1503, and in the 18 yere of the raigne of king Henry the seuenthe.

Was I not borne of olde worthy linage?
Was not my mother queene, my father kyng?
Was I not a kingses fere in marriage?
Had I not plenty of euer yellaunt thing?
Mercifull God this is a straunge reckenyng:
Rychesse, honour, welth, and anuentry,
Hath me forsaken, and lo now here I lye.
   If worship myght haue kept me, I had not gone.
   If wyt myght haue me saued, I neded not fere.
   If money myght haue holpe, I lacked none.
   But O good God what mayleth all this gere.
When deth is come thy mighty messangere,
Obey we must there is no remedy,
Me hath he somonned, and lo now here I lye.
   Yet was I late promised otherwyse,
   This yere to liue in welth and delice.
If yrst, the to newer cleane for thy seyle so wyse.
How true is for this yere thy prophecy
The yere yet lasteth, and lo nowe here I ly.
O bryttill wyth, as full of bitterness,
Thy single pleasurer doubled is with payne.
Account my sorow first and my distresse,
In sondry wyse, and reckon there agayne,
The joy that I haue had, and I dare sayne,
For all my honour, endured yet haue I,
More wo then welth, and lo now here I ly.

Where are our castels, now where are our towers,
Goodly Rychmonde some art thou gone from me,
At Westminster that costly worke of yours,
Myne owne dere lorde now shall I never see.
Almighty God vouchesafe to graunt that ye,
For you and your children well may edefy.
My palyece bylded is, and low now here I ly.
Adew myne owne dere spouse my worthy lorde,
The faithfull loue, that dyd vs both combyne,
In marriage and peaseable concorde,
Into your handes here I cleane resyne,
To be bestowd vppon your children and myne.
Erst wer you father, and now must ye supply,
The mothers part also, for lo now here I ly.
Farewell my daughter lady Margerete.
God wotte full oft if greued hath my mynde,
That ye should go where we should seldome mete.
Nowe am I gone, and haue left you behynde.
O mortall folke that we be very blynde.
That we least feare, full oft it is most nye,
From you depart I fyrest, and lo now here I ly.
Farewell Madame my lorde worthy mother,
Comfort your sonne, and be ye of good chere.
Take all a worth, for it will be no nether.
Farewell my daughter Katherine late the fere,
To prince Arthur myne owne chylde so dere,
It booteth not for me to wepe or cry,
Pray for my soule, for lo now here I ly.
Adew lord Henry my louyng sonne adew.
Our lorde encrease your honour and estate,
Adew my daughter Mary bright of hew,
God make you vertuous wyse and fortunate.
Adew sweete hart mo little daughter Kate,
Thou shalt sweete babe suche is thy desteny,
Thy mother never know, for lo now here I ly.
Lady Cicely Anne and Katheryne,
Farewell my welbeloved sisters three,
O lady Briget other sister myne,
Lo here the ende of worldly vanitee.
Now well are ye that earthly foly flee,
And hevenly thynges loue and magnify,
Farewell and pray for me, for lo now here I ly.

Adew my lorde, adew my ladies all,
Adew my faithfull seruauntes euerych one,
Adew my commons whom I never shall See in this world, wherfore to the alone,
ImmortalGod verely three and one,
I me commend me. Thy infinite mercy,
Shew to thy seruant, for lo now here I ly.

Certain meters in English written by master Thomas More in hys youth for the boke of fortune, and caused them to be printed in the begynnyng of that boke.

The wordes of Fortune to the people.

MINE high estate power and auctoritie,
If ye ne know, enserche and ye shall spye,
That riches, worship, welth, and dignitie,
Joy, rest, and peace, and all thyng fynally,
That any pleasure or profit may come by,
To mannes comfort, ayde, and sustinance,
Is all at my denyse and ordinance.
Without my favoure there is nothyng wonne.
Many a matter haue I brought at last,
To good conclusion, that fondly was begonne.
And many a purpose bounden sure and fast
With wise prouision, I haue ouercast.
Without good happe there may no wit suffise.
Better is to be fortunate than wyse.
And therfore hath there some men bene or this.
My deadly foes and written many a boke,
To my dispraise. And other cause there yrs,
But for me list not frendly on them loke.
Thus lyke the fox they fare that once forsoke,
The pleasaunt grapes, and gan for to defy them,
Because he left and yet could not come by them.
But let them write theyr labour is in voyne.
For well ye wote, myrth, honour, and richesse,
Much better is than penury and payne.
The nedty wretch that lingereth in distresse,
Without myne helpe is euer comfortellesse,
A very burden odious and loth,
To all the world, and eke to him selfe both.
But he that by my favoure may ascende,
To mighty power and excellent degree,
A common wele to gouerne and defende,
O in how blist condiccion standeth he:
Him self in honour and felicite,
And ouer that, may forther and increase,
A region hole in joyfull rest and peace.
Now in this poynyt there is no more to say,
Eche man hath of him self the gouernance.
Let euer yght then folowe his owne way,
And he that out of pouertee and mischaunce,

THOMAS MORE to them that trust in Fortune.

THOU that are prowde of honour, shape or kyne,
That hepest vp this wretched worldes treasure,
Thy fingers shrined with gold, thy tawny skynne,
With fresh apparyle garnished out of measure,
And wenset to haue fortune at thy pleasure,
Cast vp thyne eye, and loke how slipper chaunce,
Illudeth her men with chaunce and vrayunce.

Sometime she loketh as lovely, fayre and bright,
As goodly Uenus mother of Cupyde.
She beketh and she smyleth on every wight.
But this chere fayned, may not long abide.
There cometh a cloude, and farewell all our pryde.
Like any serpent she beginneth to swell,
And looketh as fierce as any fury of hell.
Yet for all that we brotele men are fayne,
(So wretched is our nature and so blynde)
As soone as Fortune list to laugh agayne,
With fayre countenauce and deceitfull mynde,
To crouche and knele and gape after the wynde,
Not one or twayne but thousandes in a rout,
Lyke swarmyng bees come flickeryng her about.

Then as a bayte she bryngeth forth her ware,
Siluer, gold, riche perle, and precious stone:
On whiche the mased people gase and stare,
And gape therefore, as dogges do for the bone.
Fortune at them laugheth, and in her trone
Amyd her treasure and waueryng rychesse,
Proudly she honeth as lady and empressse.
Fast by her syde doth very labour stand,
Pale fere also, and sorow all bewept,
Disdayn and hatred on that other hand,
Eke restles watche fro slepe with travayley kept,
His eyes drowsy and lokynge as he slept.
Before her standeth daunger and enuy,
Flattery, dysceyt, mischiefe and tirannya.

About her commeth all the world to begge.
He asketh lande, and he to pas bryng,
This tye and that, and all not worth an egge:
He would in loue prosper abose all thyng:
He keneleth downe and would be made a kyng:
He forceth not so he may money haue,
Though all the worlde accompte hym for a knaue.

Lo thus ye see diuers heddes, diuers wittes.
Fortune alone as diuers as they all,
Vnstable here and there among them flittes:
And at aventure downe her giftes fall,

Catch who so may she throweth great and small
Not to all men, as commeth sonne or dewe,
But for the most part, all among a fewe.
And yet her brotel giftes long may not last,
He that she gane them, loketh prowde and hye.
She whirld about and plucketh away as fast,
And geueth them to another by an by.
And thus from man to man continually,
She vseth to geue and take, and silly tosse,
One man to wynnyng of an others losse.

And when she robbeth one, down goth his pryde.
He wepeth and waylth and curseth her full sore.
But he that receueth it, on that other syde,
Is glad, and blesth her often tymes therefore.
But in a whyle when she loueth hym no more,
She glydeth from hym, and her giftes to,
And he her curseth, as other fooles do.

Alas the folysh people can not cease,
Ne voyd her trayne, tyll they the harme do fele.
About her alway, besely they preace.
But lord how he doth thynk hym self full wele.
That may set once his hande vpon her whel.

He holdeth fast: but upward as he flieth,
She whippeth her whel about, and there he lyeth.

Thus fell Julius from his mighty power.
Thus fell Darius the worthy kyng of Perse.
Thus fell Allexander the great conquerour.
Thus many mo then I may well reherse.
Thus double fortune, when she lyst reuser.
Her slipper fauour fro them that in her trust,
She fleeth her wyey and leyeth them in the dust.

She sodeinly enhauenceth them aloft.
And sodeynly mischeueth all the flocke.
The head that late lay easily and full soff,
In stede of pylows lyth after on the blocce.
And yet alas the most cruell proude mocke:
The deynty mowth that ladyes kissed haue,
She bryngeth in the case to kyss a knaue.

In chaungynge of her course, the chaunge shewth this,
Vp starth th a knaue, and down thare falth a knight,

The beggar ryche, and the ryche man pore is.
Hatred is turned to loye, loye to despogyght.
This is her sport, thus proueth she her myght.

Great boste she maketh of one be by her power.
Welthy and wretched both with in an howre.

Pouertee that of her giftes wyl nothing take,
Wyth mery chere, looketh vpon the preace,
And seeth how fortunes houshold goeth to wrake.
Fast by her standeth the wyse Socrates,
Arristippus, Pythagoras, and many a lese
Of olde philosophers. And eke agaynst the soor:

Bekyth hym poore Diogenes in his tonne.
THE HISTORY OF THE

With her is Byas, whose countryt lackt defence,
And whyлом of their foes stode so in dout,
That eche man hastily gan to cary thence,
And asked hym why he nought caryed out.
I bere quod he all myne with me about:
Wisdom he mcnt, not fortunes borote fees.
For nought he counted his that he might leese.

Heraclitus eke, lyst fellowship to kepe
With glade ponteree, Democritus also :
Of which the fyrst can neuer cease but wepe,
To see how thicke the bynyed people go,
With labour great to purchase care and wo.
That other laugheth to see the foolysch apes,
How earnestly they walk about their capes.

Of this poore sect, it is conen vsage,
Onely to take that nature may sustayne,
Banishing cleane all other surplasage.
They be content, and of nothing complayne.
No nygarde eke is of his good so fayne.
But they more pleasure haue a thousande folde,
The secrete draughtes of nature to beholde.

Set fortunes servauntes by them and ye wull,
That one is free, that other euer thrall,
That one content, that other neuer full,
That one in suretys, that other lyke to fall.
Who lyst to advise them bothe, parceyue he shall,
As great difference between them as we see,
Betwixt wretchednes and felicite.

Now haue I shewed you bothe: these whiche ye lyst,
Stately fortune, or humble ponteree:
That is to say, nowe lyeth it in your fyst,
To take here bondage, or free libertee.
But in thy paynte and ye do after me,
Draw you to fortune, and labour her to please,
If that ye thinke your selfe to well at ease.

And fyrst vpon the louely shall she smile,
And frendly on the cast her wandering eyes,
Embrace the in her armes, and for a whyle,
Put the and kepe the in a fooles paradise:
And foorth with all what so thou lyst deuise,
She wyll the graunt it liberally perhapes:
But for all that beware of after clappes.

Recken you neuer of her fauoure sure:
Ye may in cloudes as easily trace an hare,
Or in drye lande cause fishes to endure,
And make the burnynge fyre his heat to spare,
And all thyse worlde in compase to forfare,
As her to make by craft or engine stable,
That of her nature is euer variable.

Sirue her day and nyght as recurrently,
Vpon thy knees as any servaunt may,
And in conclusion, that thou shalt winne thereby
Shall not be worth thy servyce I dare say.
And looke yet what she gaueth the to day,
With labour wonne she shall happily to morow.
Plucke it agayne out of thyne hand with sorow.

Wherefore ye thou in suretye lyst to stande,
Take pouertes parte and let prowde fortune go,
Recceyue nothynge that commeth from her hande.
Loue maner and vertue: they be onely tho
Whiche double fortune may not take the fro.
Then mayst thou boldly defye her turnyng chaunce:
She can the nether hynde nor auaunce.

But and thou wylt nedes medle with her treasure,
Trust not therein, and spende it liberally.
Beare the not proude, nor take not out of measure,
Bylde not thyne house on boeth vp in the skye,
Nonne falleth farre, but he that climbeth hye.
Remember nature sent the hyther bare,
The gyftes of fortune count them borrowed ware.

THOMAS MORE to them that seke Fortune.

Who so delyteth to proven and assay,
Of wavering fortune the vncterayne lot,
If that the aunswere please you not alway,
Blame ye not me: for I commaunde you not.
Fortune to trust, and eke full well ye wot,
I haue of her no brydle in my fist,
She renneth loose, and turneth where she lust.

The rolyng dyse in whome your lucke doth stande,
With whose vnhappy chaunce ye be so wroth.
Ye knowe your selfe came neuer in myne hande.
Lo in this pond be fysehe and frogges both.
Cast in your nette: but be you hie or lothe,
Hold you content as fortune lyst assyue:
For it is your owne fyshyng and not myne.

And though in one chaunce fortune ye offend,
Grudge not there at, but bare a mery face.
In many an other she shall it amend.
There is no manne so farre out of her grace,
But he sometyme hath comfort and solace:
Ne none agayne so farre forth in her favour,
That is full satisfied with her behauiour.

Fortune is stately, solemne, prowde, and hye:
And rychesse gaueth, to haue servyce therefore.
The nedly begger catcheth an halfpeny:
Some manne a thousande pound, some lesse some more.
But for all that she kepeth euer in store,
From every manne some parcell of his wyll,
That he may pray theryore and servyce her styll.
Some manne hath good, but children hath he none.
Some manne hath both, but he can get none health.
Some hath all thre, but vp to honours trone,
Can he not crepe, by no maner of stelth.
To some she sendeth, children, ryches, welthe,
Honour, woorship, and reverence all hys lyfe:
But yet she pyncheth hym with a shrewde wyfe.

Then for asmuch as it is fortunyes guise,
To graunte to manne all thyng that he wyll axe,
But as her selfe lust order and deuyse,
Doth euer manne his parte diuide and tax,
I crouysale ye eche one trusse vp your packes,
And take no thyng at all, or be content,
With suche rewarde as fortune hath you sent.

All thynges in this boke that ye shall rede,
Does as ye lyst, there shall no manne you bynde,
Them to beleue, as surely as your crede.
But notwithstandingy certes in my mynde,
I durst well swere, as true ye shall them fynde,
In everye poynct eche answere by and by,
As are the judgemeotes of astronomye.

The Descripcon of Richard the thirde.

RICHARDE the third soone, of whom we nowe entreate, was in witte and courage egall with either of them, in bodye and prowessse farre vnder them bothe, little of stature, ill fetured of limmes, croke backed, his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard fauoured of visage, and such as is in states called warlye, in other menne otherwise, he was malicious, wrathfull, enuous, and from afore his birth, euere frowarde. It is for trouth reported, that the duches his mother had so much a doe in her travaile, that shee could not bee delilvered of hym uncutte: and that he came into the worlde with the feete farwarde, as menne bee borne out-warde, and (as the fame runneth) also not vntoched, whither menne of hatred repore aboue the trouthe, or elles that nature chaunged her course in hys beginninge, whiche in the course of his lyfe many things vnpartlye committed. None euill captaine was hee in the warre, as to whiche his disposition was more metely then for peace. Sundrye vyctories hadde hee, and sometimmes overthrowes, but neuer in defaulte as for his owne parsonye, either of hardinesse or polytyke order, free was he called of dyspence, and somme what aboue hys power liberal, with large giftes hee get him vnstedfasti fredenshippe, for whiche hee was faine to pil and spyle in other places, and get him stedfast hatred.
Hee was close and sectere, a deepe dissimuler, lowlye of counteynance, arrogant of heart, outwardly coupinable where he inwardly hated, not letting to kisse whome he thought to kyll: dispiti-ous and cruell, not for euill will alway, but after for ambicion, and either for the suretie and encrease of his estate. Frende and foo was muche what indifferent, where his aduauntage grew, he spared no mans deathe, whose life withstood his purpose.
He slewe with his owne handes king Henry the sixt, being prisoner in the Tower, as menne constantly saye, and that without commaundemant or knowledge of the king, whiche woulde vndoubtedly yf he had entended that thinge, have appointed that boocherly office, to some other then his owne borne brother.

Somme wise menne also weene, that his drift courerly conuaude, lacked not in helping furth his brother of Clarence to his death: whiche hee resisted openly, howbeit somwhat (as menne deme) more faintly then he that wer hartley minded to his welth. And they that thus deme, thinke that he long time in king Edwarde life, forethought to be king in that case the king his brother (whose life hee looked that euill dyete shoule shorten) shoule happen to decease (as in dede he did) while his children wer yonge. And thei deme, that for thyss intente he was gladde of his brothers death the duke of Clarence, whose life must nedes have hindered hym so entendyng, whither the same duke of Clarence hadde keppe him true to his nephew the yonge king, or enterprised to be kyng himself. But of al this pointe, is there no certaintie, and whoso .diuineth vnpon conjectures, maye as wel shote to farre as to short. Howbeit this hau I by credible informacion learned, that the selfe nighte in whiche ykng Edwarde died, one Mystylebrooke longe ere mornyng, came in greate haste to the house of one Pottyer dwellyng in Reddecrosse strete without Crepulgate: and when he was with hastye rappyng quickly letten in, hee shewed vnto Pottyer that ykng Edwarde was departed. By my trouth mannye quod Pottyer then wyll my mayster the duke of Gloucester bee kyng. What cause hee hadde soo to thinke harde it is to saye, whether hee being toward hym, anye thynge knewe that hee suche thynge purposed, or otherwise he had anye inkelyng thereof: for hee was not likely to speake
it of noughte.

But nowe to returne to the course of this hystorye, were it that the duke of Gloucester hadde of old fore-minded this conclusion, or was nowe at erste thereunto moued, and putte in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the yonge princes, his nephews
as opportunitye and lykelyhoode of spede, putthey a manne in courage of that hee neuer entended) certayne is it that hee contriued theyr destruction, with the vsurpacion of the regal dignitie vpon hymselfe. And for as muche as hee well wiste and holpe to mayntayn, a long continued grudge and hearte brendynghe betwene the quenes kinred and the kinges blood eyther partye enuying others authoritie, he nowe thought that their deuision shoulde bee (as it was in dede) a fortherlye begynnynge to the pursuite of his intente, and a sure ground for the foundation of al his building yf he might firste vnder the pretext of reuengynge of olde displeasure, abuse the anger and ygnoraunce of the tone partie, to the destruccion of the tother: and then wynnynge to this purpose as manye as he could: and those that coulde not be wonne, myght be loste ere they looked therefore. For of one thing was hee certayne, that if his entente were perceiued, he shold soone haue made peace betwene the bothe parties, with his owne bloude.

Kynge Edwarde in his life, albeit that this discencion beetwene hys friendedes somewhat yrked hym: yet in his good health he somewhat the lesse regarded it, because hee thought whatsoeuer busines should falle beetwene them, hymselfe should alwaye bee hable to rule bothe the parties. But in his last sickness, when hee receiued his naturall strengthe soo sore enfeblid, that hee dyspayred all reconuery, then hee consyderenge the yueth of his chyldren, albeit hee nothynge lesse mistrusted then that that happened, yet well forsyynge that manye harmes myghte growe by theyr debate, whyle the yueth of hys chyldren should lacke discretion of themselfe and good counsayle of their frendes, of whiche either party shold counsayle for their owne commodity and rather by pleasante aduyse too wynnynge themselfe fauour, then by profitable advertisement to do the children good, he called some of them befor him that were at variaunce, and in especyall the lorde marques Dorsethe the quenes sonne by her fyrste housebande, and Richarde the lord Hastynes, a noble man, than lorde chamberlayne agayne whom the quene specially grudged, for the great fauoure the kyng bare hym, and also for that shee thoughte hym secretylye famylyer with the kyng in wanton companyme. Her kynerd also bare hym sore, as well for that the kyng hadde made hym captayne of Caluye (which office the lorde Ruyers, brother to the quene, claimed of the kinges former promise) as for diverse other great giftes which he receyued, that they loked for. When these lordes with diverse other of bothe the parties were comne in presence, the kyng liftinge vppe hymselfe and vndersetteth with pillowes, as it is reported on this wyse sayd vnto then, My lordes, my dere kinsmenne and alies, in what plighte I lye you see, and I feele. By whiche the lesse whyle I looke to lyue with you, the more depelye am I moued to care in what case I leaue you, for such as I leaue you, suche my children lyke to fynde you. Whiche if they should (that Godde forbydde fynde you at variaunce, myght happe to fall them selfe at warre er their discretion woulde serue to sette you at peace. Ye se their yueth, of whiche I recken the onely suretie to reste in your concord. For it suffiseth not al you loue them, yf eche of you hate other. If they wer memme, your faithfulnesse happelye woulde suffise. But childhood must be maintained by mens authoritie, and slipper youth vnderpropped with elder counsayle, which neither they can haue, but ye geue it, nor ye geue it, yf ye gree not. For wher eche laboureth to breake that the other maketh, and for hatred of eche of others parson, impugneth eche others counsayle, there must it nedes bee long ere anye good conclusion goe farwarde. And also while either partye laboureth to be chiefe, flattery shall haue more place then plaine and faithfull aduyse, of whyche muste needes ensure the cuyll bringinge vppe of the prynce, whose mynd in tender youth infect, shal readil fall to mischief and riot, and drawe down with this noble relme to ruine, but if grace turn him to wisdome, which if God send, then thei that by euill menes before pleased hym best, shal after fall farthest out of fauour, so that euell driftes drewe to nought, and good plain wayes prosper. Great variaunce hath ther long bene betwene you, not alway for great causes. Sometime a thing right wel intended, our misconstruccion turmeth vppe worse or a smal displeasure done vs, eyther our owne affeccion or euill tongues agreeueth. But this wote I well ye neuer had so great cause of hatred, as ye have of voue. That we be al men, that we be christen men, this shall I leve for precher to tel you (and yet I wote nere whither any precher wordes ought more to moue you, then his that is by and by gooying to the place that thei all preache of.) But this shal I desire you to remember, that the one parte of you is of my bloode, the other of myne alies, and eche of you with other, eyther of kynerd or affinitie, whiche spirytuall kynderd of affynyty, if the sacramente of Christes churche, heare that weghte with vs that woulde Godde thei did, shoulde no lesse moue vs to charite, then the respecte of fleshlye consangunitye. Oure Lorde forbydde, that you loue together the worse, for the selfe cause that you ought to loue the better. And yet that happeneth. And no where fynde wee so deadlye debate as amongst them, whyche by nature and lawe moste oughte to agree together. suche a pestilente serpent is ambition and desyre of vaine glorye and sourainety, whiche amongst states where he once enteth crepeth forth so farre, tyll with deuision and variance he turneth all to mischiefe. First longing to be neste the best, afterwarde egall with the beste, and at laste chiefe and aboute the beste. Of which immoderate appetite of woorship, and thereby of debate and dissenccion what losse, what sorowe, what trouble hath within these few yeares grown in this realme, I praye Godde as wel forgeate as weel remembre.

Whiche thinges yf I could as well haue foresene, as I haue with my more payne then pleasure proued, by Goddes blessed Ladie (that was euere his othe) I woude never haue won the courtesey of mennes knees, with the losse of so manye heads. But sithen thynge passed cannot be gaine called, muche oughte wee the more beware, by what occasion we haue taken soo greate hurt aforde, that we essoones fall not in that occasion agayne. Nowe be those grieues passed, and all is (Godde be thanked) quiete, and ylike righte wel to prosper in wealthfull peace under youre coseyns my children, if Godde send them life and you lone. Of whiche twoo thinges, the lesse losse wer they by whome thoughg Godde dydde hys pleasure, yet shoulde the realme alway finde kinges and peraduenture as good kinges. But yf you among your selue in a childes regne fall at debate, many a good man shall perish and happily he to, and ye to, erc thys land finde peace again. Wherfore in these laste wordes that euere I looke to speake with you: I exhort you and require you al, for the loue that you haue euere borne to me, for the loue that I haue euere borne to you, for the loue that our Lord beareth to vs all, from this time forward, all grieues forgotten, ech of you loue other. Whiche I verelye truste you will, if ye any thing earthly regard, either Godde or your king, affinitie or kinred, this realme, your owne countrey, or your owne surety. And therewithal the king no longer enduring to sitte vp, laide him downe on his right side, his face towarde them: and none was there present that could refrain from weping. But the lorde recomforting him with as good wordes as they could, and answering for the time as the thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence (as by their wordes appered) eche forgaue other, and joyned their hands together, when (as it after appeared by their dedes) their hearts wer far a sonder. As sone as the king was departed, the noble prince his sonne drew toward London, which at the time of his decease, kept his houshold at Ludlow in Wales. Which countrey being far of from the law and recourse to justice, was begun to be farre oute of good wyll and waxen wild, robbures and riuers walking at libertie uncorrected. And for this encheason the prince was in the life of his father sente thithere, to the ende that the authoritie of his presence should refraine euill disposed persons fro the baldness of their former outerges, to the gouvernance and ordering of this yong prince at his sending thither, was there appointed Sir Anthony Woduiile lord Riuers and brother unto the quene, a right honourable man, as valiaunte of hande as politike in counsayle. Adioyned wer there vnto him other of the same partie, and in effect euery one as he was nest of kin vnto the quene, so was planted next about the prince. That drifte by the quene not unwisely devised, whereby her bloode mighte of youth be rooted in the princes favor, the duke of Glocester turned vnto their destruction, and upon that grounde set the foundation of all his unhappy building. For whom soewe he perceiued, either at variance with them, or bearing himself their favor, hee brake vnto them, som by mouth, som by writing or secret messengers, that it neyther was reason nor in any wise to be suffered, that the yong king their master and kinsmanne, shooode bee in the haundes and custodye of his mothers kinred, sequestred in maner from theyr compani, and attendance, of which cueri one ought him as faithful service as they, and manye of them far more honorable part of kin then his mothers side: whose blood (quod he) sauing the kinges pleasure, was ful vnmetely to be matched with his: whiche nowe to be as who say removed from the kyng, and the lesse noble to be left aboute him, is (quod he) neither honorable to hys magestie, nor vnto vs, and also to his grace no surety to haue the mightiest of his frendes from him, and vnto vs no little jeopardy, to suffer our welproved euill willers, to grow in ouergret authoritie with the prince in youth, namely which is lighte of beleve and some perswaded. Ye remember I trow king Edward himself, albeit he was a manne of age and of discreccion, yet was he in manye thynge ruleth by the bende, more then stode either with his honour, or our profite, or with the commoditie of any mame els, except onely the immoderater advauncement of them selfe. Whiche whither they sorer thristed after their owne weale, or our woe, it wer harde I wene to gesse. And if some folkes frendship had not holden better place with the king, then any respect of kinred, thei might peraudenture easily have be trapped and brought to confusion somme of vs cre this. Why not as easily as they have done some other already, as neere of his royal bloode as we. But our Lord hath wroght his wil, and thanke be to his grace that peril is past. Howe be it as great is growing, ye we comfort suffer this yonge kyng in oure enemies hande, whiche without his wyttyng, might abuse the name of his commuandements, to anu of our vndoing, which thyng God and good provision forbyd. Of which good provision none of vs hath any thing the lesse neede, for the late made attonentene, in which the kings pleasure hadde more place then the parties willles. Nor none of vs I beleue is so vnwyse, ouersone to truste a newe frende made of an olde foe, or to think that an honyuer kindnes, sodainely contract in one houre continued, yet scant a fortnight, shold be deper setted in their stomaches: then a long accustomed malice many yeres rooted.

With these worlde and wrytinges and suche other, the duke of Gloucester sone set a fyre, them that where of themself etho to kindle, and in especial twayne, Edwerde duke of Buckingham, and Richardere lorde Hastings and chaumberlayn, both men of honoure and of great power. The tone by longe succession from his ancestrie, the tother by his office and the kings favour. These two not bearing echother to other so muche loue, as hatred bothe vnto the queenes partie: in thys poynct accorded together wyth the duke of Gloucester, that they wolde vterlye amowe fro the kinges companye, all his mothers frendes, vnder the name of their enemies. Upon this concluded, the duke of Gloucester vnderstanding, that the lorde whiche at that tyme were aboute the kyng, entended to bryng hym vppon to his coronacion, accompaniuned with suche power of theyr frendes, that it shoulde bee harye for hym to bryng his purpose to passe, without the gathering and great assemble of people and in maner of open warre, wherof the ende he wiste was doubtous, and in which the kyng being on their side, his part shold have the face and name of a rebellione: he secretly therefore by durers meanes, caused the quene to be perswaded and brought in the mynd, that it neither wcr nede, and also shold be iopeardous, the king to come vp strong. For where as nowe every lorde loned other, and none other thing studied vppon, but aboute the coronacion and honour of the king: if the lorde of her kinred shold assemble in the kings name muche people, thei should geue the lordes atwixe whome and them hadde bene sommetyme debate, to feare and suspecte, lease thei shoulde gather thys people, not for the kynges sauegarde whome no manne empugned, but for their destruction, haungyng more regarde to their olde variaunce, then their newe attonemne. For whiche cause thei shoulde assemble on the other partie muche people agayne for their defence, whose power she wiste wel farre stretched. And thus shold al the realm fall on a rore. And of al the hurt that thereof should ensue, which was likely not to be litel, and the most harme there like to fal whe the lest would, al the worlde woulde put her and her kinred in the wyght, and sayt that thei had vnwysely and vntrewlye also, broken the amittie and peace that the kyng her husband so prudentelye made, betwene hys kinne and hers in his death bed, and whiche the other party faithfully observed.

The quene being in this wise perswaded, suche woord sent vnto her somne, and vnto her brother being aboute the kynges, and ouer that the duke of Gloucester hymselfe and other lorde the chiefe of hys bene, wrote vnto the kynges soo reuerently, and to the queenes frendes, there soo loungelie, that they nothyng earthelye mystrustynge, brought the kynges vppon in greate haste, not in good spede, with a sober companye. Nowe was the king in his waye to London gone, from Northampton, when these dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham came thither. Where remained behynd, the lorde Ryuers the kynges vncle, entendynge on the morrowe to follow the kynges, and bee with hym at Stonye Stratforde miles thence, carly or he departed. So was there made that nyghte suche frendelye chere betwene these dukes and the lorde Ryiers a greate while. But incontinent after that they were openlye with greaty courteyse departed, and the lorde Ryiers lodged, the dukes secretelye with a fewe of thse mooste priyeye frendes, sette them downe in coynsayle, wherin they spent a greate parte of the nyght. And at their risynge in the dawynge of the day, thei sent about priulye to thier seruantes in the innes and lodgynges about, gynnenge them commandement to make them selve shortly readye, for their lordew wer to horsebackyard. Vppon whiche messages, manye of their folke were attendaunt, when manye of the lorde Ryiers seruantes were vnreadye. Nowe hadde these dukes taken also into their custodye the kayes of the inne, that none shoulde passe foorth without theiyr licenice.

And ouer this in the hyghe waye warde Stonye Stratford where the kynges laye, they hadde beestowed certayne of theyr folke, that should sende
backe agayne, and compell to retourne, anye manere that were gotten oute of Northampton toward Stonye Stratforde, tyll they should gue other lycencet. For as muche as the duket themselfe entendedt for the shewe of theire dylygente, to bee the fyrste that shouldt that daye attende vpon the kynges hightnesse oute of that towne: thus bare they folke in hande. But when the lorde Ryuer dvnderstoodt the gates closed, and the wayes on cuerye side besette, neyther hys servauntes nor hymselfe suffered to go oute, parcelluyng well so greate a thynge without his knowledge not begun for nought, comparyng this maner present with this last nightes chere, in so few houres so gett a chaunge maruellouslye misliket. How be it sith hee couldt not gett awaye, and keep himselfe close, hee woulde not, lest he shouldt seeme to hyde himselfe for some secret feare of hys owne faulte, whereof he saw no such cause in hym self: he determined vpon the suretie of his owne conscience, to goe boldelye to them, and inquire what thys matter myghte meane. Whome as soone as they sawe, they beganne to quarrelle with hym, and saye, that hee intended to sette daunce betweene the kyng the and them, and to brynge them to confusion, bet it shouldt not lye in hys power. And when hee beganne (as hee was a very well spoken manne) in goodly wise to excuse himselfe, they taryt not the ende of his aunswere, but shortlye tooke him and putte him in warde, and that done, fourthevyth wente to horsebacke, and toke the waye to Stonye Stratforde. Where they founde the kinge with his companie readye to leape on horsebacke, and departed forwarde, to leave that lodging for them, because it was to streighte for bothe companie.
And as soone as they came in his presence, they lichtte adowne with all theire companie aboute them.
To whome the duke of Buckingham saide, goe afore gentlemenne and yeomen, kepe your rounmes.
And thus in goodly arraye, thei came to the kinde, and on theire knees in very humble wise, salued his grace; whiche receyued them in very yoynes and amiable maner, nothinge earthlye knowing nor mistrustinge as yet. But even by and by in his presence, they piked a quarrell to the lorde Richarde Grayte, the kynges other brother by his mother, sayinge that hee with the lorde marques his brother and the lorde Ryuers his vncle, hadd commpassed to rule the kinde and the realme, and to sette vari-aunce, among the states, and to subdewe and de-stroye the noble blood of the realme. Toward the accomplishinge whereof, they sayde that the lorde Marques hadde entered into the Tower of London, and thence taken out the kynges treasur, and sent menne to the sea. All whiche thinge these duket wiste well were done for good purposes and necessary by the whole counsale at London, sauing that somewhat thei must sai. Vnto whiche woordes, the king aunswered, what my brother Marques hath done I cannot sai. But in good faith I dare well aunswered for myne vncle Ryuers and my brother here, that thei be innocent of any such matters.
Ye my lige saide the duke of Buckingham thei haue kepte theire dealing in these matters farre fro the knowledge of your good grace. And fourthevth thei arrested the lord Richard and Sir Thomas Waughan knighte, in the kynges presence, and broughte the king and all backe vnto Northampton, where the tooke agayne further counsale. And there they sent awaie from the kyng whom it pleased them, and sette newe servauntes aboute him, such as lyked better them than him. At whiche dealinge hee wepte and was nothing contenete, but it botted not.
And at dyner the duke of Gloucester sente a dishe from his owne table to the lorde Ryuers, prayers him to be of good chere, all shouldt be well inough.
And he thanked the duke, and prayed the messenger to bearre it to his nephewe the lorde Richard with the same message for his comfort, who he thought had more neede of containment, as one to whom such aduersitie was strange. But himselfe had been al his dayes in vre therewith, and therefore couldt bearre it the better. But for al this coun-fortable courteyse of the duke of Gloucester he sent the lorde Ryuers and the lorde Richard with Sir Thomas Vaugham into the North country into dierers places to prison, and afterward al
Pomfrat, where they were in conclusion be

A letter written with a coyle by Sir Thomas More to hys doughter maistres Margaret Roper, within a whyle after he was a prisoner in the Tower.

MYNE own good doughter, our lorde be thanked
I am in good helthe of bodye and in good quiet of minde: and of worldly thynge I no more desyer then I haue. I besech hym make you all mery in the hope of heauen. And such thynge as I somewhat longed to talke with you all, concerning the worlde to come, our Lorde put them into your mynudes, as I truste he dothe and better to by hys holy spirite: who blesse you and preserue you all. Written wyth a coyle by your tender loving father, who in hys pore prayers forgetteth none of you all, nor your babes, nor your nurses, nor your good husbands, nor your good husbands shrewde wyues, nor your fathers shrewde wyfe neither, nor our other frendes. And thus fare ye hartely well for lacke of paper.

Thomas More, knight.

Two short ballettes which Sir Thomas More made for hys pastime while he was prisoner in the Tower of London.

Lewys the lost louer.

Ey flattering fortune, loke thou neuer so fayre,
Or neuer so plesantly begin to smile,
As though thou wouldst my ruine all repayre,
During my life thou shalt not me begile.
Trust shall I God, to entre in a while.
Hys hauen or heauen sure and vnforme
Euer after thy calme, loke I for a storme.

Dauey the dycer.

Long was I lady Lucke your seruung man,
And now haue lost agayne all that I gat,
Wherfore whan I thinke on you nowe and than,
And in my mynde remember this and that,
Ye may not blame me though I beshrew your cat,
But in fayth I blesse you agayne a thousand times,
For lending me now some layesure to make rymes.

At the same time with Sir Thomas More lived Skelton, the poet laureate of Henry VIII. from whose works it seems proper to insert a few stanzas, though he cannot be said to have attained great elegance of language.

The Prologue to the Bouge of Courte.

In Autummpe when the sonne in vyrgyne
By radyante hete enryped hath our corne
Whan Luna full of matabylyte
As Emperes the dyademe hath worn
Of our pole artyke, smylynge halfe in ascorne
At our foly, and our vnsedfastnesse
The time whan Mars to warre hym dyd dres.
I callynge to mynde the greate auctoryte
Of poetes olde, whiche full cratcly
Vnder as courte termes asouldel be
Can touche a truth, and cloke subtily
With fressehe vvterance full sentencyously
Dynuerse in style some spared not vyece to wryte
Some of mortalitie nobly did endyte

Wherby I rede, theyr renome and theyr fame
Maye neuer dye, but evermore endure
I was sore mowed to a forsche the same
But ignorance full soone dyd me dysure
And shewed that in this arte I was not sure
For to illumine she sayd I was to dulle
Aduysyng me my penne awaye to pulle
And not to wryte, for he so wyll atteyne
Excedyng fether than his connyng e
His heed maye be harde, but fable is brayne
Yet have I knownen suche er this
But of reproche surely he maye not mys
That clymyneth hyer than he may fotinge haue
What and he slyde downe, who shall hym sane?
Thus vp and downe my mynde was drawen and cast
That I ne wyste what to do was beste
So sore enwered that I was at the laste
Enforsd to sleepe, and for to take some reste
And to lye downe soeasome as I my dreste
At Harwynche porte slumbrynge as I laye
In myne hostes house called powers keye.

Of the wits that flourished in the reigne of Henry
VIII. none has been more frequently celebrated than the earl of Surry; and this history would therefore have been imperfect without some specimens of his works, which yet it is not easy to distinguish from those of Sir Thomas Wyat and others, with which they are confounded in the edition that has fallen into my hands. The three first are, I believe, Surry's; the rest, being of the same age, are selected, some as examples of different measures, and one as the oldest composition which I have found in blank verse.

Descripccion of Spring, wherein each thing renews, save only the lover.

The soote season that bud, and bloom fourth bringes,
With grene hath cladde the hyll, and eke the vale,
The Nightingall with fethers new she singes;
The turtle to her mate hath told the tale:
Somere is come, for every spray now springes,
The hart hath hunge his olde head on the pale,
The bucke in brake his winter coathe flynges;
The fishes flete with newe repayed scale:
The adder all her slough away she flynges,
The swift swallow pursueth the fyes smalle,
The busy bee her honey how she mynges;
Winter is wore that was the flource bale.
And thus I see among these pleasant thynges
Eche care decayes, and yet my sorrow sprynges.

Descripcion of the restless estate of a lover.

WHEN youth had led me half the race,
That Cupides scourge had made me runne:
I looked back to meet the place,
From whence my weary course begunne:
And then I saw howe my desire
Misguiding me had led the waye.
Myne eyne to greedy of theyre hyre,
Had made me lose a better prey.
For when in sighes I spent the day,
And could not cloake my grief with game;
The boyling smoke dyd still bewray,
The present heat of secret flame:
And when salt teares do bayne my breast,
Where love his pleasant traynes hath sown,
Her beauty hath the fruytes opprest,
Ere that the buddes were spronge and blowne.
And when myne eyen dyd still pursue,
The flying chase of theyre request;
Theyre greedy looks did oft renew,
The hydden wounde within my breste.
When every loke these cheekes might stayne,
From dedly pale to glowing red;
By outward signes appeared playne,
To her for helpe my harte was fled.
But all to late Love learneth me,
To payut all kynd of Colours new;
To blynd theyre eyes that else should see
My speckled chekes with Cupides hew.
And now the covert brest I clame,
That worship Cupide secretely;
And nourished his sacred flame,
From whence no blairing sparkes do flye.

Descripcion of the fickle Affections, Pangs, and Sleights of Love.

SUCH wayward wyes hath Love, that most part in discord
Our wille do stand, whereby our hartes but seldom do accord:
Decyte is hys delighte, and to begyle and mocke
The simple hartes which he doth strike with froward divers stroke.
He causeth th' one to rage with golden burning darte,
And doth alay with Leaden cold, again the others harte,
Whose gleames of burning fyre and easy sparkes of flame,
In balance of unequal weyght he pondereth by ame
From easye ford where I myghte wade and pass full well,
He me withdrawes and doth me drive, into a depe dark hell:
And me witholdes where I am calde and offred place,
And wille me that my mortal foe I do beseke of Grace;
He lettes me to pursue a conquest welnere wonne
To follow where my paynes were lost, ere that my sute begunne.
So by this means I know how soon a hart may turne
From warre to peace, from truce to stryfe, and so agayne returne.
I know how to content myself in others lust,
Of little stufic unto my self to weave a webbe of trust:
And how to hyde my harmes with sole dyssembling chere,
Whan in my face the painted thoughtes would outwardly appeare.
I know how that the bloud forsakes the face for dreed,
And how by shame it staynes agayne the Chekes with flaming red:
I know under the Grene, the Serpent how he lurkes:
The hammer of the restless forge I wote eke how it workes.
I know and con by roate the tale that I woulde tell
But ofte the wordes cyme fourth awrye of him that loveth well.
I know in heate and colde the Lover how he shakes,
In synging howe he doth complayne, in sleeping how he wakes
To languish without ache, sickellesse for to consume,
A thousand thynges for to devise, resolvynge of his fume;
And though he lyste to see his Ladyes Grace full sore
Such pleasures as delght his Eye, do not his helthe restore.
I know to seke the tracte of my sydered foe,
And fere to fynde that I do seek, but chiefly this I know,
That Lovers must transfourme into the thynge beloved,
And live (alas! who would believe?) with sprite from Lyfe removed.
If all the world were sought so farre,
Who could finde suche a wight,
Her beauty twinkleth lyke a starre
Within the frosty night.

The Lover refused of his love, embraceth vertue.

MY youthfull yeares are past,
   My joyfull dayes are gone,
My lyfe it may not last,
My grave and I am one.
   My myrth and joyes are fled,
And I a Man in wo,
Desirous to be ded,
My mischiefe to forgo.
I burne and am a colde,
I freese anyddes the fyer,
I see she doth witholde
That is my honest desyre.
I see my helpe at hande,
I see my lyfe also,
I see where she doth stande
That is my deadly fo.
I see how she doth see,
And yet she will be blynde,
I see in helping me,
She sekes and wil not fynde.
I see how she doth wrye,
When I begynne to mone,
I see when I come nye,
How fayne she would be gone.
I see what wil ye more,
She will me gladly kill,
And you shall see therfore
That she shall have her will.
I cannot live with stones,
It is too hard a foode,
I wil be dead at ones
To do my Lady good.

THE HISTORY OF THE

As for stoute men in field that day subdued,
Who princes taught how to discern a man,
That in his head so rare a jewel bearers,
But over all those same Camenes, those same,
Divine Carmenthes, whose honour he procureth,
As tender parent doth his daughters weale,
Lamented, and for thankes, all that they can,
Do cherish hym deceast, and set him free,
From dark oblivion of devoures death.

Barclay wrote about 1550; his chief work is the Ship of Fooles, of which the following ex-tact will shew his style.

Of Mockers and Scorners, and false Accusers.

1 HEARTLESS fooles, haste here to our doctrine,
Leave off the wayses of your enormitie,
Enforce you to my preceptes to encline,
For here shall I shewe you good and verite:
Encline, and ye finde shal great prosperitie,
Ensuing the doctrine of our fathers olde,
And godly lawes in valour worth great golde.

Who that will follow the graces manyfolde
Which are in vertue, shall find avancement:
Wherfore ye fooles, that in your sinne be bolde,
Ensiue ye wisdome, and leave your lewe intent,
Wisdome is the way of men most excellent:
Therfore haue done, and shortly spede your pace,
To quaynt your self and company with grace.

Learne what is vertue, therin is great solace,
Learne what is truth, sadnes and prudence,
Let grutche be gone, and grauntie purchase,
Forsake your folly and inconuenience,
Cease to be foole, and ay to sue offence,
Follow ye vertue, chiefe roote of godlynes,
For it and wisdome is ground of clentynes.

Wisedome and vertue two things are doubles,
Whiche man endueth with honour speciall,
But suche heartes as slepe in foolishnes
Knoweth nothing, and will nought know at all:
But in this litle barge in principall
All foolish mockers I purpose to repreue,
Clawe he his backe that feeleth itche or greue.

Mockers and scorners that are harde of beleue,
With a rough combe here will I clawe and grate,
To prove if they will from their vice remewe,
And leave their folly, which causeth great desirion:
Suche cayties spare neyther poore man nor estate,
And where their selfe are most worthy desirion,
Other men to scorne is all their most condition.

Yet are no fools of this abuse,
Whiche of wise men despiseth the doctrine,
With mows, mockes, scorne, and collusion,
Rewarding rebukes for their good discipline:
Shewe to suche wisdome, yet shall they not encline
Unto the same, but set nothing therby,
But mocke thy doctrine, still or openly.

So in the worlde it appeareth commonly,
That who that will a foole rebuke or blame,
A mocke or move shall he have by and by:
Thus in derision have fooles their special game,
Correct a wise man that would eschew ill name,
And fauie woulde learne, and his lewde life amende,
And to thy wordes he gladly shall intende.

If by misfortune a rightwise man offende,
He gladly suffereth a juste correction,
And him that him teacheath taketh for his frende,
Him selfe putting melkyly unto subiection,
Following his preceptes and good direction:
But yt that one a foole rebuke or blaine,
He shall his teacher hate, sluander and diffame.

Howbeit his wordes oft turne to his own shame,
And his owne darte returne to him agayne,
And so is he sore wounded with the same,
And in wo endeth, great misery and payne.
It also proued full often is certayne,
That they that on mockers alwaye their mindes cast,
Shall of all other be mocked at the last.

He that goeth right, stedfast, sure, and fast,
May him well mocke that goeth halting and lame,
And he that is white may well his scornes cast
Against a man of Inde: but no man ought to blame
Another vice, while he vseth the same.
But who that of sinne is cleane in deed and thought,
May him well scorne whose liuing is starke nought.

The scornes of Naball full dere should have been bought,
If Abigail his wife discrete and sage,
Had not by kindnes right crafty meanes sought,
The wrath of David to temper and asswage.
Hath not two beares in their fury and rage
Two and fortie children rent and torne,
For they the prophet Helyseus did scorne.

So might they curse the time that they were borne.

For their mocking of this prophete diuine:
So many other of this sort often mourne
For their lewde mockes, and fall into ruine.
Thus it is foly for wise men to incline,
To this lewde flocke of fooles, for see thou shall
Them moste scorning that are most bad of all.

The Lenuoy of Barclay to the fools.

YE mocking fools that in scorn set your joy,
Proudly despising Gods punition:
Take ye example by Cham the sonne of Noy,
Which laughed his father vnto derision,
Which him after cursed for his transgression,
And made him seruaunt to all his lyne and stocke.
So shall ye caytifs at the conclusion,
Since ye are nought, and other scorn and mocke.

About the year 1553 wrote Dr. Wilson, a man celebrated for the politenes of his style, and the extent of his knowledge: what was the state of our language in his time, the following may be of use to show.

PRONUNCIATION is an apte orderinge both of the voyce, countenaunce, and all the whole bodye, accordynge to the worthines of suche woordes and matter as by speache are declared. The vse hereof is suche for anye one that liketh to haue prayse for tellynge his tale in open assemblie, that haung a good tongue, and a comelye countenaunce, he shal be thought to passe all other that haue the like vtteraunce: though they haue much better learning. The tonge geneth a certayne grace to euerye matter, and beautifieth the cause in like maner, as a swete soundynge lute muche setteth forth a meanne devised ballade. Or as the sounde of a good instrumente styrryth the hearers, and moueth much delite, so a cleare soundyng voice comforteth muche our deintie cares with muche swete melodie, and causeth vs to allowe the matter rather for the reporters sake, then the reporter for the matters sake. Demosthenes therfore, that famouse oratour, beyng asked what was the chieffe point in al oratorie, gaue the chiefe and onely praise to Pronunciation; being demaunded, what was the seconde, and the thirde, he still made aunswere, Pronunciation, and would make none other aunswere, till they lefte askyng, declaryng hereby that arte without vtteraunce can dooe nothynge, vtteraunce without arte con dooe right muche. And no doubt that man is in outwarde appearance half a good clarke, that hath a cleane tongue, and a comely gesture of his body. Æschines lykwyse beyng banished his countrie through Demosthenes, when he had rede to the Rhodians his own oration, and Demosthenes aunswere thereunto, by force whereof he was banished, and all they marueiled muche at the excellencie of the same: then (q d Æschines) you would have marueiled muche more if you had heard hymselfe speak it. Thus beyng cast in miserie and bannished for euer, he could not but geue suche greate reporte of his deadly and mortal ennemy.

Thus have I deduced the English language from the age of Alfred to that of Elizabeth; in some parts imperfectly for want of materials; but I hope, at least, in such a manner that its progress may be easily traced, and the gradations observed, by which it advanced from its first rudeness to its present elegance.
GRAMMAR, which is the art of using words properly, comprises four parts; Orthography, Etymology, Syntax, and Prosody.

In this division and order of the parts of grammar I follow the common grammarians, without enquiring whether aetter distribution might not be found. Experience has long shown this method to be so distinct as to obviate confusion, and so comprehensive as to prevent any inconvenient omissions. I likewise use the terms already received, and already understood, though perhaps others more proper might sometimes be invented. Syllaburgus, and other innovators, whose new terms have sunk their learning into neglect, have left sufficient warning against the trilling ambition of teaching arts in a new language.

Orthography is the art of combining letters into syllables, and syllables into words. It therefore teaches previously the form and sound of letters.

Our letters are commonly reckoned twenty-four, because ancients \(i\) and \(j\), as well as \(u\) and \(u\), were expressed by the same character; but as those letters which have different powers, have now different forms, our alphabet may be properly said to consist of twenty-six letters.

None of the small consonants have a double form, except \(f\), \(i\); of which \(f\) is used at the beginning and middle, and at the end.

Vowels are five, \(a\), \(e\), \(i\), \(o\), \(u\).

Such is the number generally received; but for \(i\) it is the practice to write \(y\) in the ends of words, as \(thy\), \(hy\); before \(i\), as from \(die\), \(dye\); from \(beautify\), \(beautifying\); in the words \(says\), \(days\), \(eyes\); and in words derived from the Greek, and written originally with \(v\), as \(system\), \(ovum\); \(sympathy\), \(ovine\).

For \(u\) we often write \(w\) after a vowel, to make a glide; as \(raw\), \(grow\), \(view\), \(vow\), \(swallow\), \(brown\).

The sounds of all the letters are various.

In treating on the letters, I shall not, like some other grammarians, use the principal form of their form, as an antiquarian; nor into their formation and application by the organs of speech, as a mechanick, anatomist, or physician; nor into the properties and gradation of sounds, or the elegance or harshness of particular combinations, as a writer of universal and transcendental grammar. I consider the English alphabet only as it is English; and even in this narrow disquisition, I follow the example of former grammarians, perhaps with more reverence than judgment, because by writing in English I suppose my reader already acquainted with the English language, and consequently able to pronounce the letters, of which I treat the pronunciation; and because of sounds in general it may be observed, that words are unable to describe them. An account therefore of the primitive and simple letters is useless almost alike to those who know their sound, and those who know it not.

Of Vowels.

A.

A has three sounds, the slender, open and broad.

A slender is found in most words, as face, name; and in words ending in ation, as creation, salvation, generation.

The \(a\) slender is the proper English, called very justly by Erpenius, in his Arabick Grammar, a \(a\) Anglicum et \(e\) mitum, as having a middle sound between the open \(a\) and the \(e\). The French have a similar sound in the word pens, and in their masculine.

A open is the \(a\) of the Italian, or nearly resembles it; as father, rather, congratulate, fancy, glass.

Many words pronounced with a broad were anciently written with \(au\), as fault, mount; and we still say fault, vowel. This was probably the Saxon sound, for it is yet retained in the northern dialects, and in the rustic pronunciation; as morn for man, hand for hound.

The short \(a\) approaches to the open, as grass.

The long \(a\), if prolonged by \(e\) at the end of the word, is always slender, as grass, fame.

A forms a glide; with \(i\) or \(y\), and \(u\) or \(w\). \(A\) or \(ay\) as in plain, vain, gay, clay, has only the sound of the long and slender \(a\), and differs not in the pronunciation from plane, wave.

\(Au\) or \(aw\) has the sound of the German \(au\), as raw, naughty.

\(Ae\) is sometimes found in Latin words not completely naturalised or assimilated, but is no English glide; and is more properly expressed by single \(e\), as Caesar, Enac.
ENGLISH

E is the letter which occurs most frequently in the English language.

E is long, as in scene; or short, as in cellar, separate, celebrate, men, thin.

It is always short before a double consonant, or two consonants, as in x, subject, object, etc., or before a vowel, as in seed, steady.

E is always mute at the end of a word, except in monosyllables that have no other vowel, as the; or proper names as Penelope, Phoebe, Derbe; being used to modify the foregoing consonant, as since, once, hundred, obliged; or to lengthen the preceding vowel, as bin, bone, can, cone; pin, pine; thin, tune; rob, robe; pop, pope; sir, fire; cur, cure; tub, tube.

Almost all words which now terminate in consonants end originally in e, as year, gear; wilderness, wildness; which e probably had the force of the French e feminine, and constituted a syllable with its associate consonant; for, in old editions, words are sometimes divided thus, clove-re, fel-le, know-ldge. This e was perhaps for a time vocal or silent in poetry, as convenience required; but it has been long wholly mute. Camden in his Remains calls it the silent e.

It does not always lengthen the foregoing vowel as globe, live, give.

It has sometimes in the end of words a sound obscure, and scarcely perceptible, as open, shooen, shotten, whistle, particular, here.

This faintness of sound is found when e separates a mute from a liquid, as in rotten; or follows a mute and liquid, as in cottage.

E forms a diphthong with a, as near; with i, as deign, receive; and with u or w, as new, flew.

E sounds like e long, as mean; or like e, as dear, clear, near.

E is sounded like e long, as seize, perceiving.

E sounds as u long and soft.

E, a, u, are combined in beauty and its derivatives, but have only the sound of u.

E may be said to form a diphthong by reduplication, as agree, sleeping.

E is found in yernam, where it is sounded as e short; and in people, where it is pronounced like ee.

I.

I has a sound, long, as fine; and short as fin.

That is uniformly observable in i, which may be likewise remarked in other letters, that the short sound is not the long sound contracted, but a sound wholly different.

The long sound in monosyllables is always marked by the e final, as thin, thine.

I is often sounded before r as a short u; as flirt, first, shirt.

It forms a diphthong only with e, as field, shield, which is sounded as the double ee; except friend, which is sounded as frend.

I is joined with ex in flew, and ew in reaw; which triphongs are sounded as the open u.

O.

O is long, as bône, obedient, corrording; or short, as block, knock, oblique, foll.

Women is pronounced wîmen.

The short o has sometimes the sound of a close u, as sum, come.

O coalesces into a diphthong with a, as noon, gown, approach; oa has the sound of o long.

O is united to v in some words derived from Greek, as economy, but o being not an English diphthong they are better written as they are sounded, with only e, economy.

With i, as oil, soil,moil, noise.

This condition of letters seems to unite the sounds of the two letters as far as two sounds can be united without being destroyed, and therefore approaches more nearly than any combination in our tongue to the notion of a diphthong.

With o, as bool, hoot, cooler; oo has the sound of the Italian u.

With u or w, as our, power, flower; but in some words has only the sound of a long o, as in sound, bowl, bow, grow.

These different sounds are used to distinguish different significations, as bow, an instrument for shooting; bow, a depression of the head; sors, the she of a boar; sora, to scatter seed; bowl, an oblique body; bow, a wooden vessel.

Ou is sometimes pronounced like o soft, as court; sometimes like o short, as cough; sometimes like u close, as could; or u open, as rough, tough; which use only can teach.

Ou is frequently used in the last syllable of words which in Latin end in or, and are made English, as honour, labour, favour, from honor, labor, favor.

Some late innovators have ejected the u, without considering that the last syllable gives the sound rather of or nor ur, but a sound between them, if not compounded of both; besides that they are probably derived to us from the French mouus in ear, as honours, favour.

U.

U is long in use, confusion; or short, as us, conclusion.

It coalesces with a, e, i, o; but has rather in these combinations the force of the w, as quaff, guest, guil, quite, languish; sometimes in wi the i loses its sound, as in juicer. It is sometimes mute before a, e, i, y, as guard, guest, guise, buy.

U is followed by e in virtue, but the e has no sound.

Uc is sometimes mute at the end of a word, in imitation of the French, as provoque, syncope, plague, vague, banquer.

Y.

Y is a vowel, which, as Quintilian observes of one of the Roman letters, we might want without inconvenience, but that we have it. It supplies the place of i at the end of words, as thy; before an i, as dying; and is commonly retained in derivative words where it was part of a diphthong in the primitive; as destroy, destroyer; betray, betrayed, betrayer; pray, prayer; say, seyger; day, days.

Y being the Saxon vowel, which was commonly used where i is now put, occurs very frequently in old books.

General Rules.

A vowel in the beginning or middle syllable, before two consonants, is commonly short, as opportunity.

In monosyllables a single vowel before a single consonant is short, as stâg, frâg.

Many is pronounced as if it were manny.

Of Consonants.

B.

B has one unvailed sound, such as it obtains in other languages.

It is mute in debt, debtor, subter, doubt, lamb, limb, dumb, thumb, clamb, comb, womb.

It is used before f and r, as black, browm.

C.

C has before e and i the sound of z; as sincerely, centrick, century, circular, cister, city, siciety; before a, o, and u, it sounds like k, as calm, concavity, copper, incorporate, curiosity, concipiscence.

C might be omitted in the language without loss, since one of its sounds might be supplied by r, and the other by k, but that it preserves to the eye the etymology of words, as fare from fareis, entage from entace.

Ch has a sound which is analysed into tch, as church, chin, crutch.

It is the same sound which the Italians give to the e simple before i and e, as cettô, cerro.

Ch is sounded like k in words derived from the Greek, as chystian, scheme, chokeur.

Arch is commonly sounded ark before a vowel, as archangel; and with the English sound of ch before a consonant, as archbishop.

Ch, in some French words not yet assimilated, sounds like sh, as machine, chipeur.

C, having no determinate sound, according to English orthography, never ends a word; therefore we write stick, block, which were originally stickes, blockes, in such words. C is now mute.

It is used before f and r, as clock, crow.

D.

D is uniform in its sound; as death, diligent.

It is used before r, as drow, drum; and w, as dwell.
A GRAMMAR OF THE

F.

F, though having a name beginning with a vowel, is numbered by the grammarians among the semi-vowels; yet has this quality of a mute, that it is commodiously sounded before a liquid, as flask, fly, freckle. It has an unvariable sound, except that of is sometimes spoken nearly as or.

G.

G has two sounds, one hard, as in guy, go, gun; the other soft, as in gem, giant.

At the end of a word it is always hard, ring, snug, song, frog.

Before e and i the sound is uncertain.

G before e is soft, as in gem, generation, except in gear, gerd, geese, get, gewgaw, and derivatives from words ending in g, as singing, stronger, and generally before e at the end of words, as finger.

G is mute before n, as gnash, sign, foreign.

G before i is hard, as give, except in giant, gigantick, gibbet, gibes, giblets, Giles, gill, gilliflower, gin, ginger, gingle, to which may be added Egypt, and gypsy.

Gh, in the beginning of a word, has the sound of the hard g, as ghostly; in the middle and sometimes at the end, it is quite silent, as though, right, sought, spoken tho', rite, sounte.

It has often at the end the sound of f, as laugh, whence laughter retains the same sound in the middle; cough, trough, sung, tough, enough, slough.

It is not to be doubted, but that in the original pronunciation gh had the force of a consonant, deeply guttural, which is still continued among the Scotch.

G is used before h, t, and r.

H.

H is a note of aspiration, and shows that the following vowel must be pronounced with a strong emission of breath, as hat, horse.

It seldom begins any but the first syllable, in which it is always sounded with a full breath, except in heir, herb, holster, honour, humble, honest, humour, and their derivatives.

It sometimes begins middle or final syllables in words compounded, as blockhead; or derived from the Latin, as comprehended.

J.

J consonant sounds uniformly like the soft g, and is therefore a letter useless, except in etymology, as ejaculation, jester, flock, juice.

K.

K has the sound of hard c, and is used before e and i, where, according to English analogy, c would be soft, as kept, king, skirt, skeptic, for so it should be written, not sceptic, because ce is sounded like s, as in scene.

It is used before n, as knell, knot, but totally loses its sound in modern pronunciation.

K is never doubled; but e is used before it to shorten the vowel by a double consonant, as cockpit, pickle.

L has in English the same liquid sound as in other languages.

The custom is to double the l at the end of monosyllables, as kill, will, full. These words were originally written lillo, wille, full; and when the e first grew silent, and afterwards omitted, the l was retained, to give force, according to the analogy of our language, to the foregoing vowel.

L is sometimes mute, as in calf, half, halves, calves, could, would, should, talk, salt, salmon, falcon.

The Saxons who delighted in guttural sounds, sometimes aspirated the l at the beginning of words, as his a loaf, or bread; hlapopo a lord; but this pronunciation is now disused.

Le at the end of words is pronounced like a weak l, in which the e is almost mute, as table, shuttle.

M.

M has always the same sound, as murmur, monumental.

N.

N has always the same sound, as noble, manners.

N is sometimes mute after m, as damn, condemn, hymn.

P.

P has always the same sound, which the Welsh and Germans confound with B.

P is sometimes mute, as in psalm, and between m and t, as tempt.

Ph is used for f in words derived from the Greek, as philosopher, philanthropy, Philip.

Q.

Q, as in other languages, is always followed by u, and has a sound which our Saxon ancestors well expressed by ep, cw, as quadrant, queen, equestrian, quilt, enquiry, quire, quotidian.

Qu is never followed by u.

Qu is sometimes sounded, in words derived from the French, like k, as conquer, liquor, rique, chequer.

R.

R has the same rough marling sound as in other tongues.

The Saxons used often to put h before it, as before l at the beginning of words.

Rh is used in words derived from the Greek, as yogurt, søgerhure, catarhous, rheum, rheumatick, rhyme.

Re at the end of some words derived from the Latin or French, is pronounced like a weak er, as theatre, sepulchre.

S has a hissing sound, as sibilation, sister.

A single s seldom ends any word, except in the third person of verbs, as loves, grows; and the plurs of nouns, as trees, bushes, ditches; the pronouns this, his, ours, ours, us; the adverb that; and words derived from Latin, as relus, surplus; the close being always either in r, as house, horse, or in s, as grass, dress, dish, less, anxiously; grace, dress.

S single, at the end of words, has a grosser sound, like that of z, as trees, eyes, except this, thus, us, relus, surplus.

It sounds like z before ion, if a vowel goes before, as intrusion; and like s, if it follows a consonant, as conversion.

It sounds like z before mute, as refuse, and before y final, as rosy; and in those words bosom, desire, wisdom, prison, prisoner, present, present, damsel, casement.

It is the peculiar quality of s that it may be sounded before all consonants, except x and z, in which s is comprised, a being only x, and z a hard or gross s. This is therefore termed by grammarians s non potestis literis; the reason of which the learned Dr. Clarke erroneously supposed to be, that in some words it might be doubled at pleasure. Thus we have in several languages: Euxyns, scatter, sedere, saracelct, ephelit, sagnare, sagnare, sagnare, shaker, slumber, smell, science, spring, squint, shriek, step, strength, strange, stripe, svery, swell.

S is mute in isle, island, demesne, viscount.

T has its customary sound, as take, temptation.

Ti before a vowel has the sound of si, as salvation, except an s goes before, as question; excepting likewise derivatives from words ending in ty, as mighty, mightier.

Th has two sounds; the one soft, as thus, whither; the other hard, as thing, think. The sound is soft in these words, then, there, and there, with their derivatives and compounds; and in that, these, thou, thee, thy, thine, their, they, this, those, them, though, thus, and in all words between two vowels, as father, whether; and between y and a vowel, as buried.

In other words it is hard, as thick, thunder, faith, faithful.

Where it is softened at the end of a word, an s silent must be added, as breath, breathe; cloth, clothe.
ENGLISH TONGUE.

V.

V has a sound of near affinity to that of f, vein, vanity.

From s, in the islandic alphabet, s is only distinguished by a discrinct point.

W.

Of w, which in diphthongs is often an undoubted vowel, some grammarians have doubted whether it ever be a consonant; and not, rather, as it is called, a double w or on, as water may be resolved into ouer; but letters of the same sound are always reckoned consonants in other alphabets: and it may be observed, that w follows a vowel with any hiatus or difficulty of utterance, as frosty winter.

Wh has a sound accounted peculiar to the English, which the Saxons better expressed by hp, hw, as what, whence, whiting; in where only, and sometimes in wholesome, we is sounded like a simple h.

X.

X begins no English word; it has the sound of ks, as axe, extraneous.

Y.

Y, when it follows a consonant, is a vowel; when it precedes either a vowel or diphthong, is a consonant, ye, young. It is thought by some to be in all cases a vowel. But it may be observed of y as of w, that it follows a vowel without any hiatus, as ray, youth.

The chief argument by which w and y appear to be always vowels is, that the sounds which they are supposed to have as consonants, cannot be uttered after a vowel, like that of all other consonants: thus we say, tu, ut, do, odd; but in wod, dow, the two sounds of w have no resemblance to each other.

Z.

Z begins no word originally English; it has the sound, as its nameizzard or s hard expresses, of an s uttered with closer compression of the palate by the tongue, as freeze, froze.

In orthography I have supposed orthophy, or just utterance of words, to be included; orthography being only the art of expressing certain sounds by proper characters. I have therefore observed in what words any of the letters are mute.

Most of the writers of English grammar have given long tables of words pronounced otherwise than as they are written, and seem not sufficiently to have considered, that of English, as of all living tongues, there is a double pronunciation, one cursory and colloquial, the other regular and solemn. The cursory pronunciation is always vague and uncertain, being made different in different mouths by negligence, unskilfulness, or affectation. The solemn pronunciation, though by no means immutable and permanent, is yet always less remote from the orthography, and less liable to the vicissitudes of fashion. They have however generally formed their tables according to the cursory speech of those with whom they happen to converse; and concluding that the whole nation combines to voice language in one manner, have often established the jargon of the lowest of the people as the model of speech.

For pronunciation, the best general rule is to consider those of the most elegant speakers who deviate least from the written words.

There have been many schemes offered for the emendation and settlement of our orthography, which, like that of other nations, being formed by chance, or according to the fancy of the earliest writers in rude ages, was at first very various and uncertain, and is yet sufficiently irregular. Of these reformers some have endeavoured to accommodate orthography better to the pronunciation, without considering that this is to measure by a shadow, to take that for a model or standard which is changing while they apply it. Others, less assuredly indeed, but with equal success of success, have endeavoured to proportion the number of letters to that of sounds, that every sound may have its own character, and every character a single sound. Such would be the orthography of a new language, to be formed by a synod of grammarians upon principles of science. But who can hope to prevail on nations to change their practice, and make all their old books useless? or what advantage would a new orthography procure equivalent to the confusion and perplexity of such an alteration?

Some of these schemes I shall however exhibit, which may be used according to the diversities of genius, as a guide to reformers, or terror to innovators.

One of the first who proposed a scheme of regular orthography, was Sir Thomas Smith, secretary of state to Queen Elizabeth, a man of real learning, and much practised in grammatical disquisitions. Had he written the following lines according to his scheme, they would have appeared thus:

At length Erasmus, that great inju'd name,
The glory of the priesthood, and the shame,

Stemm'd the wild torrent of a barbarous age,
And drov those holy Vandals off the stage.
At leng's Erasmus, fat gret ingard nam,
As glori of Sc piethiud, and Sc aam,
Stemm'd 4'ild torrent of a barbarous ag,
And drov Scis ill Vandals iff and stag.

After him another mode of writing was offered by Dr. Gill, the celebrated master of St. Paul's school in London; which I cannot represent exactly for want of types, but will approach as nearly as I can by means of types now in use, so as to make it understood, exhibiting two stanzas of Spenser in the reformed orthography.

Spenser, hook iii, can. 3.

Unto a nankful wreath, and tell me, is this the meed,
With which her sovereign mercy thou dost quite? Thy life she saved by her gracious deed;
But thou dost wear with villous despight,
To blot her honour, and her heavenly light.

Die, rather die, than so disloyally;
Deem of her high desert, or seem so light.

Fair death is to shun more shame: then die,
Die, rather die, than ever live disloyally.

But if to love disloyalty it be,
Shall I then hate her, that from a death's door Me brought? ah! far be such reproach from me.

No, what can I less do, than her love therefore,
Sith I her dear reward cannot rester;

Die, rather die, and dying do her serve,
Dying her serve, and living her adore.

The life she gave, the one she doth deserve;
Die, rather die, than ever from her service swerve.

Ve'nankful wreath, said bj, is Sc the mj,
Will w'rb her somnain meri Sou dust geji;
Dj ljf rj sawed bj her gnasus djd;
But Sou dust wen wiis vinus disptj.

Tu blot hr honor, and her hevulj ljht;
Dj, re'er dj, Scn so displajd.

Djm of hr hich dartz, or sm so lizht:
Fair dev it is to run mar fim; Scn dj,
Dj, re'er dj, Scn evu displaij.

But if tu lur displaij it bj,
Sal I Scn hit hr Sat from de'dez ddr.
Mj brouth! ab! far bj soo repro from mj,
Wat kan I lis du Scn bar lur safit,
Sih I hr du reward kanot rester?

Dj, re'er dj, and djj, du hr ser,
Djij hr ser, and livi hr derer.

Dlj ljf rj gai, Sclj ljf'de duk dezai;
Dj, re'er dj, Scn ser fr hr serus swa.

Dr. Gill was followed by Charles Butler, a man who did not want an understanding which might have qualified him for better employment. He seems to have been more sanguine than his predecessors, for he printed his book according to his own scheme; which the following specimen will make easily understood.

But whenever you have occasion to trouble their patience, or to come among them being troubled, it is better to stand upon your guard, than to trust to their gentleness. For the safeguard of your face, which they have most mind unto, provide a purse with, made of coarse boultering, to be drawn and knit about your collar, which for more safety is to be lined against the eminent parts with woolen cloth. First cut a piece about an inch and a half broad, and half a yard long, to reach round by the temple and forehead, from one ear to the other; which being sowed in his place, join unto it two short pieces of the same breadth under the eyes, for the balls of the cheeks, and then set another piece about the breadth of a shilling, against the top of the nose. At other times when they are not angered, a little piece half a quarter broad, to cover the eyes and parts about them, may serve, though it be in the heat of the day.

Pet pensever you hav' occasion to trouble Seir patience' or to come among Sem being troubled, it is better to stand upon your guard, &n to trust to Seir gentleness. For the saf gard of your face, pio Sey hav' most mind unto, provide a purse with, mad' of coarse boultering, to be drawn and knit about your collar, which for more safety is to be lined against & eminent parts with woolen clot. First cut a pec about an inch and a half broad, and half a yard long, to reach round by &e temples and forhead, from one ear to the other; pio being sowed in his plac', join unto it two port pieces of the san' breadth under &e eyes, for the balls of &e cheeks, and then set an &er pec about &e breadth of a pillar against the top &e nose. At o'her tim's, pre Sey af not angered, a little pec half a quarter broad, to cover &e eyes and parts about them, may serve, bawg it be in the heat of &e day. Butler on the Nature and Properties of Blox, 1654
A GRAMMAR OF THE

In the time of Charles I, there was a very prevalent inclination to change the orthography; as appears, among other books, in such editions of the works of Milton as were published by himself. Of these reformers, every man had his own scheme; but they agreed in one general design of accommodating the letters to the pronunciation, by ejecting such as they thought superfluous. Some of them would have written these lines thus:

All the erst
Shall then be paradise, a happier place
Than this of Eden, and far happier days.

Bishop Wilkins afterwards, in his great work of the philosophical language, proposed, without expecting to be followed, a regular orthography; by which the Lord’s prayer is to be written thus:

Yr Fader hoith art in heven halloed bi dyhi nam, thyi cingdym cyin, dyhi will be dyin in erst as it is in heven, &c.

We have since had no general reformers; but some ingenious men have endeavoured to deserve well of their country, by writing honor and labor for honour and labour, red for read, in the preter-tense, sat for sayd, repeate for repeat, explain for explaina, or declare for decline. Of these it may be said, that as they have done no good, they have done little harm; both because they have innovated little, and because few have followed them.

The English language has properly no dialects; for the writer of an English book has no necessity of preserving his country, nor his province, nor his nation, but has no variations in England than in most other nations of equal extent. The language of the northern counties retains many words now out of use, but which are commonly of the genuine Teutonic race, and is subject with a pronunciation which now seems harsh and rough, but was probably used by our ancestors. The northern speech is therefore not barbarous but obsolete. The speech in the western provinces seems to differ from the general diction rather by a depraved pronunciation, than by any real difference which letters would express.

ETYMOLOGY.

ETYMOLOGY teaches the deduction of one word from another, and the various modifications by which the sense of the same word is diversified; as horse, horses; I love, I loved.

OF THE ARTICLE.

The English have two articles, a or an, and the.

A has an indefinite signification, and means one, with some reference to more; as This is a good book, that is, one among the books that are good. He was killed by a sword, that is, some sword. This is a better book for a man than a boy, that is, for one of those that are men than for one of those that are boys. An army might enter without resistance, that is, any army.

In the senses in which we use a or an in the singular, we speak in the plural without an article; as, these are good books.

I have made an the original article, because it is only the Saxon an, or an, one, applied to a new use, as the German ein, and the French en: the being cut off before a consonant in the speed of utterance.

Grammarians of the last age direct that an should be used before h: whence it appears that the English anciently aspired less. An is still used before the silent h, as an herb; or to: an honest man; or otherwise a: as, A horse, a horse, my kingdom for a horse. Shakespeare.

An or a can only be joined with a singular, the correspondent plural is the noun without an article, as I want a pen; I want pens; or with the pronominal adjective same, as I want some pens.

The article has a particular and definite signification.

The fruit

Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world.

That is, that particular fruit, and this world in which we live. So, He giveth fodder for the cattle, and green herbs for the use of man; that is, for those beings that are cattle, and his use that is man.

The is used in both numbers.

I am as free as Nature first made man,
Ere the base laws of servitude began,
When wild in woods the noble savage ran. Dryden.

Many words are used without articles; as,
1. Proper names as, John, Alexander, Longinus, Aristarchus, Jerusalem, Athens, Rome, London. God is used as a proper name.
2. Abstract names, as blackness, witchcraft, virtue, vice, beauty, ugliness, love, hatred, anger, good-nature, kindness.
3. Words in which nothing but the mere being of any thing is implied: This is not beer, but water: this is not brass, but steel.

OF NOUNS SUBSTANTIVES.

The relations of English nouns to words going before or following, are not expressed by cases, or changes of termination, but as in most of the other European languages by prepositions, unless we may be said to have a genitive case.

Singular.

Nom. Magister, of a Master, the Master.
Gen. Magistri, of a Master, the Master, or Masters, the Masters.
Dat. Magistro, to a Master, to the Master.
Acc. Magistrum, a Master, the Master.
Voc. Magistri, Master, O Master.
Abl. Magistro, from a Master, from the Master.

Plural.

Nom. Magistri, Masters, the Masters.
Gen. Magistrorum, of Masters, of the Masters.
Dat. Magistris, to Masters, to the Masters.
Acc. Magistros, Masters, the Masters.
Voc. Masters, the Masters.
Abl. Magistris, from Masters, from the Masters.

Our nouns are therefore only declined thus:

Scholar, Gen. Scholars, Plur. Scholars.

These genitives are always written with a mark of elision, master’s, scholar’s, according to an opinion long received, that the s is a contraction of his, as the soldier’s valor, for the soldier his valor: but this cannot be the true original: because s is put to female nouns, Woman’s beauty; the Virgin’s delicacy; the raddle’s insence, the multitude’s folly: in all these cases it is apparent that his cannot be understood. We say likewise, the foundation’s strength, the diamond’s lustre, the writer’s energy; but in these cases his may be understood, be he and his having formerly been applied to neutrals in the place now supplied by it and its.

The learned and sagacious Walls, to whom every English grammarian owes a tribute of reverence, calls this modification of the noun an adjective possessive; I think with no more propriety than he might have applied the same to the genitive in the Latin genitivs, Troiae oriis, or any other Latin genitive. Dr. Lowth, on the other part, supposes the possessive pronouns mine and thine to be genitive cases.

This termination of the noun seems to constitute a real genitive indicating possession. It is derived to us from those who declined puru a smith; Gen. rumor a of a smith; Plur. rumier, or puriers, smiths; and so in two other of their seven declensions.

It is a further confirmation of this opinion, that in the old poets both the genitive and plural were longer by a syllable than the original word: knits, for knight’s, in Chaucer; bonis, for leaves, in Spenser.

When a word ends in s, the genitive may be the same with the nominative, as Venus Temple.

The plural is formed by adding s, as table, tables; fly, flies; son, sons; wood, woods; or es where s could not otherwise be sounded, as after ch, s, sh, x, z ; after c sounded like s, and g like j; as the mute e is vocal before s, as lance, lances; outrage, outrages.

The formation of the plural and genitive singular is the same.

A few words yet make the plural in n, as men, women, men, and more, are used in about the same way as the ancient English.

Words that end in f commonly form their plural by ves, as loaf, loaves; calf, calves.

Except a few, muf, muffs; chief, chiefs. So hoop, rope, proof, relief, mischief, puff, cuff, dwarf, handkerchief, grief.
Irregular plurals are teeth to tooth, lice to louse, mice from mouse, glee from gleam, feet from foot, dice from die, pence from penny, brethren from brother, children from child.

Plurals ending in s have for the most part no genitive; but we say, Womans excellencies, and Weigh the mens souls against the ladies hairs. Pope.

Dr. Wallis thinks the Lord's house may be said for the house of Lords; but such phrases are not now in use; and surely an English ear rebels against them. They would commonly produce a troublesome ambiguity, as the Lord's house may be the house of Lords, or the house of A Lord. Besides that the mark of elision is improper, for in the Lord's house nothing is cut off.

Some English substantives, like those of many other languages, change their terminations as they express different sexes, as prince, princess; actor, actress; him, his, hims; her, herm, hermen. To these mentioned by Dr. Lawth may be added arbiter, poet, charmer, peach, tennis, paper, cattier, vixen, author, austre, truster, and perhaps others. Of these variable terminations we have only a sufficient number to make us feel our want; for when we say of a woman that she is a philosopher, an astronomer, a builder, a woman, a dancer, we perceive an impropriety in the termination which we cannot avoid; but we can say that she is an architect, a botanist, a student, because these terminations have not annexed to them the notion of sex. In words which the necessities of life are often requiring, the sex is distinguished not by different terminations, but by different names, as a bull, a cow; a horse, a mare; equus, equa; a cock, any or sir; and sometimes by pronouns prefixed as a be-ge, a she-gent.

OF ADJECTIVES.

Adjectives in the English language are wholly indeclinable; having neither case, gender, nor number, and being added to substantives in all relations without any change; as a good woman; a good woman of a good woman; a good man, good men, of good men.

The Comparison of Adjectives.

The comparative degree of adjectives is formed by adding er, the superlative by adding est, to the positive; as fairer, fairest; lovely, lovelier, loveliest; sweet, sweeter, sweetest; low, lower, lowest; high, higher, highest.

Some words are irregularly compared; as good, better, best; bad, worse, worst; little, less, least; near, nearer, nearest; much, more, most; many (or more), more, (for more), most (for most); late, later, latest or last.

Some comparatives form a superlative by adding most, as nether, nethermost; outer, outermost; under, undermost; up, upper, uppermost; fore, former, foremost.

Most is sometimes added to a substantive, as topmost, southwestmost.

Many adjectives do not admit of comparison by terminations, and are only compared by more and most, as benevolent, more benevolent, most benevolent.

All adjectives may be compared by more and most, even when they have comparatives and superlatives regularly formed; as as fairer, or more fairer; fairest, or most fairer.

In adjectives that admit a regular comparison, the comparative more is often used than the superlative most, as more fairer is often written for fairest, than most fairer for fairest.

The comparison of adjectives is very uncertain; and being much regulated by commodiousness of utterance, or agreement of sound, is not easily reduced to rules.

Monosyllables are commonly compared.

Polysyllables, or words of more than two syllables, are seldom compared otherwise than by more and most, as deplorable, more deplorable, most deplorable.

Dissyllables are seldom compared if they terminate in some, as subsome, toilsome; in ful, as careful, splenfeful, dreadful; in ing, as trigling, charming; in ous, as porous; in less, as careless, harmless; in ed, as wretched; in id, as candid; in al, as mortal; in ent, as recent, fervent; in ain, as certain; in ire, as missive; in dy, as woody; in fy, as puffly; in ky, as rocky, except lucky; in my, as roomy; in ny, as skinny; in py, as roppy, except happy; in ry, as hoary.

Some comparatives and superlatives are yet found in good writers, formed without regard to the foregoing rules; but in a language subjected to so little and so lately to grammar, such anomalies must frequently occur.

So shady is compared by Milton.

Paradise Lost.

She in shadiest covert kis.

Tun'd her nocturnal note.

And virtuous.

What she will to say or do,

Seems wiser, virtuous, discreetest, best.

Paradise Lost.

So trifling, by Bay, who is indeed so great authority.

It is not so decorous, in respect of God, that he should immediately do all the meanest and triflingest things himself, without making use of any inferior or subordinate minister.

Ray on the Creation.

Famous, by Milton.

I shall be nam'd among the famousst

Of women, sung at solemn festivals.

Milton's Agamemn.

Inveentor, by Ascham.

Those have the inventest heads for all purposes, and roundest tongues in all matters.

Ascham's Schoolemaster.

Mortl, by Bacon.

The mortest morts poissous practised by the West Indians, have some mixture of the blood, fat, or flesh of man.

Bacon.

Natural, by Wotton.

I will now deliver a few of the properst and naturalest considerations that belong to this piece.

Wotton's Architecture.

The wretchedest are the contemners of all helps; such as presuming on their own naturals, desire diligence, and mock at terms when they understand not things.

Ben Jonson.

Powerful, by Milton.

We have sustin'd one day in doubfult fight.

What Heav'n's great King hath pour'd/fsllest to send Against as from about his throne.

Paradise Lost.

The terminations in ish may be accounted in some sort a degree of comparison, by which the signification is diminished below the positive, as black, blacker, or tending to blackness; salt, saltier, or having a little taste of salt; they therefore admit no comparison. This termination is seldom added but to words expressing sensible qualities, nor often to words of above one syllable, and is scarcely used in the solemn or sublime style.

OF PRONOUNS.

 Pronouns in the English language are, I, thou, he, with their plurals, we, ye, they; it, who, which, what, whether, whatsoever, whatsoever, my, mine, our, ours, thy, thine, your, yours, his, her, hers, their, theirs, this, that, other, another, the some, same.

The pronouns personal are irregularly inflected.

Singular. Plural.

Nom. I We

Accus. and other Me Us

Oblique cases. § Nom. Thou Ye

Oblique. Thee You

You is commonly used in modern writers for ye, particularly in the language of ceremony, where the second person plural is used for the second person singular, You are my friend.

Singular. Plural.

Nom. He They § Applied to masculines.

Oblique. Him Them §

Nom. She They § Applied to feminines.

Oblique. Her Them §

Nom. It They § Applied to neutrals or things.

Oblique. Its Them §

For it the practice of ancient writers was to use he, and for its, his.

The possessive pronouns, like other adjectives, are without cases or change of termination.

The possessive of the first person is my, mine, our, ours; of the second, thy, thine, your, yours; of the third, his, hers, her, hers, and in the plural their, theirs, for both sexes.

Ours, yours, hers, theirs, are used when the substantive preceding is separated by a verb, as These are our books. These books are ours. Your children need our society, but ours surpass yours in learning.

Ours, yours, hers, theirs, notwithstanding their seeming plural termination, are applied equally to singular and plural substantives, as, This book is ours.

These books are ours.

Mine and thine were formerly used before a verb, as mine amiable lady, which, though now disused in prose, might he still properly continued in poetry: they are used as ours and yours, and are referred to a substantive preceding, as thy house is larger than mine, but my garden is more spacious than thine.
A GRAMMAR OF THE

Their and theirs are the possessives likewise of they, when they is the plural of it, and are therefore applied to things. Pronouns relative are, who, which, what, whether, whosoever, whatsoever.

Milton.

Whether is only used in the nominative and accusative cases; and has no plural, being applied only to one of a number, commonity to one of two, as Whether of these is left I know not. Whether shall I choose? It is now almost obsolete.

What, whether relative or interrogative, is without variation, Whosoever, whatsoever, being compounded of who or what, and soever, follow the rule of their primitives.

Singular. Plural.
(This) These (That) Those (Other) Others
(Whether)

In all cases, The plural others is not used when it is referred to a substantive preceding, as I have sent other horses. I have not sent the same horses, but others.

Another, being only an other, has no plural.

Here, there, and where, joined with certain particles, have a relative and prepositional use. Hereof, herein, hereby, hereafter, hereof, thereof, therein, thereby, thereupon, therewith, thereof, wherein, whereby, whereupon, whence, which, signify of this, in this, &c. of that, in that, &c. of which, in which, &c.

Therefore and wherewith, which are properly there for and where for, for that, for which, are now reckoned conjunctions, and continued in use. The rest seem to be passing by degrees into neglect, though proper, useful, and analogous.

They are referred both to singular and plural antecedents.

There are two more words used only in conjunction with pronouns, own and self.

Own is added to possessives, both singular and plural, as my own hand, our own house. It is emphatical, and implies a silent contrariety or opposition; as I live in my own house, that is, not in a hired house. This I did with my own hand, that is, without help, or not by proxy.

Self is added to possessives as myself, yourselves; and sometimes to personal pronouns, as himself, itself, themselves. It then, like own, expresses emphasis and opposition, as I did this myself, that is, not another; or it forms a reciprocal pronoun, as We hurt ourselves by vain rage.

Himself, itself, themselves, are supposed by Wallis to be put, by corruption, for his self, it self, their selves; so that self is always a substantive. This seems justly observed, for we say, He came himself; Himself shall do this; where himself cannot be an accusative.

OF THE VERB.

English verbs are active, as I love; or neuter, as I languish. The neuters are formed like the actives.

Most verbs signifying action may likewise signify condition or habit, and become neuters, as I love, I am in love; I strive, I am now striking.

Verbs have only two tenses inflected in their terminations, the present, and the simple preterite; the other tenses are compounded of the auxiliary verbs have, shall, will, let, may, can, and the infinitive of the active or neuter verb.

The passive voice is formed by joining the participle preterite to the substantive verb, as I am loved.

To have. Indicative Mood.

Present Tense.

Sing. I have; thou hast; he hath or has.
Plur. We have; ye have; they have.

has is a termination corrupted from hath, but now more frequently used both in verse and prose.

Simple Preterite.

Sing. I had; thou hadst; he had;
Plur. We had; ye had; they had.

Compound Preterite.

Sing. I have had; thou hast had; he has or hath had;
Plur. We have had; ye have had; they have had.

Preterplusperfect.

Sing. I had had; thou hast had; he had had;
Plur. We had had; ye had had; they had had.

Future.

Sing. I shall have; thou shalt have; he shall have;
Plur. We shall have; ye shall have; they shall have.

Second Future.

Sing. I will have; thou wilt have; he will have;
Plur. We will have; ye will have; they will have.

By reading these future tenses may be observed the variations of shall and will.

Imperative Mood.

Sing. Have, or have thou; let him have;
Plur. Let us have; have, or have ye; let them have.

Conjunctive Mood.

Present.

Sing. I have; thou have; he have;
Plur. We have; ye have; they have.

Preterite simple as in the Indicative.

Preterite compound.

Sing. I have had; thou have had; he have had;
Plur. We have had; ye have had; they have had.

Future.

Sing. I shall have; as in the Indicative.

Second Future.

Sing. I shall have had; thou shalt have had; he shall have had;
Plur. We shall have had; ye shall have had; they shall have had.

Potential.

The potential form of speaking is expressed by may, can, in the present; and might, could, or should, in the preterite, joined with the infinitive mood of the verb.

Present.

Sing. I may have; thou mayst have; he may have;
Plur. We may have; ye may have; they may have.

Preterite.

Sing. I might have; thou mightest have; he might have;
Plur. We might have; ye might have; they might have.

Present.

Sing. I can have; thou canst have; he can have;
Plur. We can have; ye can have; they can have.

Preterite.

Sing. I could have; thou couldst have; he could have;
Plur. We could have; ye could have; they could have.
In the like manner should is united to the verb.

There is likewise a double preterite.

Sing. I should have had; thou shouldst have had; he should have had;
Plur. We should have had; ye should have had; they should have had;

In like manner we use, I might have had; I could have had, &c.

Infinite Mood.

Present. To have.  Preterite. To have had.

Participle Present. Having.  Participle Preterite. Had.

Verb Active. To love.

Indicative. Present.

Sing. I love; thou lovest; he loveth, or loves;
Plur. We love; ye love; they love.

Preterite Simple.

Sing. I loved; thou lovedst; he loved;
Plur. We loved; ye loved; they loved.

Preterperfect Compound. I have loved, &c.

Preterplusperfect. I had loved, &c.

Future. I shall love, &c.  I will love, &c.

Imperative.

Sing. Love, or love thou; let him love;
Plur. Let us love; love, or love ye; let them love.

Conjunctive. Present.

Sing. I love; thou love; he love;
Plur. We love; ye love; they love.

Preterite Simple. as in the Indicative.

Preterite Compound. I have loved, &c.

Future. I shall love, &c.

Second Future. I shall have loved, &c.

Potential.

Present. I may or can love, &c.

Preterite. I might, could, or should love, &c.

Double Preterite. I might, could, or should have loved, &c.

Infinite.

Present. To love.  Preterite. To have loved.

Participle Present. Loving.  Participle Past. Loved.

The passive is formed by the addition of the participle preterite to the different tenses of the verb to be, which must therefore be here exhibited.

Indicative. Present.

Sing. I am; thou art; he is;
Plur. We are, or be; ye are, or be; they are, or be.

The plural be is now little in use.

Preterite.

Sing. I was; thou wast, or wert; he was;
Plur. We were; ye were; they were.

Wert is properly of the conjunctive mood, and ought not be used in the indicative.

Preterite Compound. I have been, &c.

Preterplusperfect. I had been, &c.

Future. I shall or will be, &c.

Imperative.

Sing. Be thou; let him be;
Plur. Let us be; be ye; let them be.

Conjunctive. Present.

Sing. I be; thou beest; he be;
Plur. We be; ye be; they be.
A GRAMMAR OF THE

me? Do they rebel? Did I complain? Didst thou love her? Did she die? So likewise in negative interrogations; Do I not yet grieve? Did she not die?

Do and did are thus used only for the present and simple preterite.

There is another manner of conjugating neuter verbs, which, when it is used, may not improperly denominate them neuter passives, as they are inflected according to the passive form by the help of the verb substantive to be. They answer nearly to the reciprocal verbs in French; as

I am risen, surrexi, Lati; Je me suis levé, French.
I was walked out, exiram; Je m’etois promené.

In like manner we commonly express the present tense as; as, I am going, co. I am grieving, dolis. She is dying, ut moritur. The tempest is raging; virtut procella. I am pursuing an enemy, hostem ineunte. So the other tenses as: We were walking, Hic estamur ut vagamur; I have been walking, I had been walking, shall or will be walking.

There is another manner of using the active participle, which gives it a passive signification; as, the grammar is now printing, grammatica jam nun charta imprimitur. The brass is forging, ara exstaurantur. This is, in my opinion, a vitious expression, probably corrupted from a phrase more pure, but now somewhat obsolete: The book is a printing. The brass is a forging; a being properly at, and printing and forging verbal nouns signifying action, according to the authority of this language.

The indicative and conjunctive moods are by modern writers frequently confounded, or rather the conjunctive is wholly neglected, when some convenience of versification does not invite its revival. It is used among the purists in the former times after if, though, ere, before, till, or until, whether, except, unless, whaover, whomever, and words of wishing; as, Doubtless thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not.

OF IRREGULAR VERBS.

The English verbs were divided by Ben Jonson into four conjugations, without any reason arising from the nature of the language, which has properly but one conjugation, such as has been exemplified; from which all deviations are to be considered as anomalies, which are indeed in our monosyllable Saxon verbs, and the verbs derived from them, very frequent; but almost all the verbs which have been adopted from other languages follow the regular form.

Our verbs are observed by Dr. Wallis to be irregular only in the formation of the preterite, and its participle. Indeed, in the sanctity of our conjugations, there is scarcely any other place for irregularity.

The first irregularity is a slight deviation from the regular form, by rapid utterance or poetical contraction: the last syllable of ed is often joined with the former by suppression of e; as lovd for loved; after e, ch, sh, f, l, x, and after the consonants s, th, when more strongly pronounced, and sometimes after m, n, r, if preceded by a short vowel, t is used in pronunciation, but very seldom in writing, rather than d; as plncht, snatch't, fish't, watch't, dcre'd, smelt'd, or placed, snatch'd, fish'd, waked, dwelled, smelted.

Those words which terminate in l or II, or p, make their preterite in t, even in solemn language: as crept, felt, dcre'd, sometimes after s, ed is changed into t, as vast; this is not constant.

A long vowel is often changed into a short one; thus, kept, slept, wpt, except, except; from the verbs, to keep, to sleep, to expect, except, expect.

Where d or t go before, the additional letter d or t, in this contracted form, coalesce into one letter with the radical d or t: if t were the radical, they coalesce into t; but if d were the radical, then into d or t, as the one or the other letter may be more easily pronounced: as read, led, spread, shed, shred; bid, chip, oled, bred, bred; split, split; rid; from the verbs to read, to lead, to spread, to shed, to shred, to bid, to hide, to chide, to read, to bred, to bred, to speed, to stride, to slide, to ride. And thus, cast, hurt, cost, burst, eat, heat, sweat, sit, quit, smit, writ, hit, met, shot; from the verbs to cast, to hurt, to cost, to burst, to eat, to heat, to sweat, to sit, to quit, to smite, to write, to bite, to hit, to meet, to shoot. And in like manner, lent, scut, rent, gift; from the verbs to lend, to send, to read, to gird.

The participle preterite or passive is often formed in en, instead of ed; as been, taken, given, slain, known; from the verbs to be, to take, to give, to stay, to know.

Many words have two or more participles, as not only written, bitten, eaten, beaten, hidden, chidden, shoten, chosen, broken; but likewise writ, bit, eat, heat, kid, chid, shot, chose, broke, are promiscuously used in the participle, from the verbs to write, to bite, to eat, to beat, to hide, to chide, to shoot, to choose, to break, and many such like.

In the same manner sown, sheen, hewn, mown, laden, laden, as well as sow'd, shew'd, he'd, mow'd, laded, laded, from the verbs to sow, to shew, to hew, to mow, to load or lade.

Concerning these double participles it is difficult to give any rule; but he shall seldom err who remembers, that when a verb has a participle distinct from its preterite, as wrote, writen, that distinct participle is more proper and elegant, as The book is writen, is better than the The book is wrote. Wrote however may be used in poetry; at least if we allow any authority to poets, who, in the exultation of genius, think themselves perhaps entitled to trample on grammarians.

There are other anomalies in the preterite.

1. Win, spin, begin, swim, strike, stick, sing, sting, fliung, ring, wring, spring, swing, drink, sink, shrunk, stink, come, and, bind, grund, wound, both in the preterite, imperfect, and participle passive, give own, spun, sworn, struck, sunk, sung, sung, fliung, wrung, ping, sprung, swung, drank, sunk, shrunk, sunk, come, run, found, bound, ground, wound. And most of them are also formed in the preterite by a, as begun, rang, sang, sprung, drank, came, ran, and some others; but most of these are now obsolete. Some in the participle passive likewise take en, as stricken, strucken, drunken, bounden.

2. Fight, teach, teach, seek, beseech, catch, buy, bring, think, work, make taught, taught, sought, besought, caught, bought, brought, thought, wrought.

But a great many of these retain likewise the regular form, as teach'd, reached, beseeched, catched, worked.

3. Take, shake, for sake, wake, awake, stand, break, speak, bear, shear, swear, tear, wear, weave, cleave, strive, thrive, drive, shine, rise, arise, sit, write, slide, abide, ride, choose, choose, tread, get, beget, forget, sethe, make in both preterite and participle took, shook, forsook, woke, awake, stood, broke, spoke, bore, shore, swore, tore, were, were, clove, strove, threw, drove, shone, rose, arose, smote, wrote, bode, abode, rode, chose, trode, got, begot, forgot, sod. But we say likewise, thrive, rise, smit, writ, abid, rid. In the preterite some are likewise formed by a, as brake, spoke, bare, share, sware, tare, war, clave, gal, begot, forget, and perhaps some others, but more rarely. In the participle passive many of them are formed by en, as taken, shaken, for sake, broken, spoken, born, sworn, swarm, torn, worn, wrove, cloven, thriven, driven, risen, smitten, ridden, chosen, trodden, gotten, begotten, forgotten, sodden. And many do likewise retain the analogy in both, as waked, awaked, sheared, seared, laved, abided, seethed.

4. Give bid, sit, make in the preterite gone, aide, sake; in both the participle passive, giv'en, bidden, setten; but in both bid.

5. Draw, know, grow, throw, blow, crow like a cock, fly, slay, see, ly, make their preterite draw, knew, grew threw, blew, crow, flew, slow, saw, lay; their participles passive by a, drawn, known, grown, thrown, flown, slain, seen, lien, lain. Yet from flee is made fled; from go, went, from the old wend, the participle is gone.

OF DERIVATION.

That the English language may be more easily understood, it is necessary to inquire how its derivative words are deduced from their primitives, and how the primitives are borrowed from other languages. In this enquiry I shall sometimes copy Dr. Wallis, and sometimes endeavour to supply his defects, and rectify his errors.
ENGLISH

TONGUE.

Nouns are derived from verbs.

The thing implied in the verb, as done or produced, is commonly either the present of the verb; as, to love, love; or to fight, a fight; to fight, a fight; or the präterite of the verb, as, to strike, I strike or struck, a stroke.

The action is the same with the participle present, as loving, frightening, fighting, striking.

The agent, or person acting, is denoted by the syllable or added to the verb, as lover, frighter, striker.

Substantives, adjectives, and sometimes other parts of speech, are changed into verbs: in which case the vowel is often lengthened, or the consonant softened; as a house, to house; brass, to brace; glass, to glaze; grass, to graze; price, to prize; breath, to breathe; a fish, to fish; oil, to oil; further, to further; forward, to forward; hinder, to hinder.

Sometimes the termination en is added, especially to adjectives; as haste, to hasten; length, to lengthen; strength, to strengthen; short, to shorten; fast, to fasten; white, to whiten; black, to blacken; hard, to harden; soft, to soften.

From substantives are formed adjectives of plenty, by adding the termination full, denoting abundance; as joy, joyful; fruit, fruitful; youth, youthful; care, careful; use, useful; delight, delightful; plenty, plentiful; help, helpful.

Sometimes, in almost the same sense, but with some kind of diminution thereof, the termination some is added, denoting something, or in some degree; as delight, delightsome; game, gamesome;irk, irksome; burden, burdensome; trouble, troublsome; light, lightsome; hand, handsome; alone, lonesome; toil, toilsome.

On the contrary, the termination less, added to substantives, makes adjectives signifying want; as worthless, witless, heartless, joyless, careless, helpless. Thus comfort, comfortless; sap, sopless.

Privation or contrariety is very often denoted by the particle un prefixed to many adjectives, or in before words derived from the Latin; as pleasant, unpleasant; wise, unwise; profitable, unprofitable; patient, impatient. Thus unworthy, unhealthful, unprofitful, unobservant, and many more.

The original English privative is un; but as we often borrow from the Latin, or its descendants, words already signifying privation, as impious, impious, it is better to take un prefixed to substantives, as unhealthful, unprofitable, unobservant, which are preferable, unless it is not easy to disentangle them.

Un is prefixed to all words originally English; as unright, untruth, unthought, unmeaning, unmannered.

Un ought never to be prefixed to a participle present, to mark a forbearance of action, as unswearing; but a privation of habit, as unpraying.

Un is prefixed to most substantives which have an English termination, as infirmities, supererogations, if they have borrowed terminations, as in or in, as infantly, imperfections, unchild, insensate; as unright, untruth, unwhole.

In borrowing adjectives, if we receive them already compounded, it is usual to add the particle prefixed, as instead, instead, improper; but if we borrow the adjective, and add the privative particles, we commonly prefix un, as unpolite, ungodly.

The prepositive particles dis and is, derived from the des and mes of the French, signify almost the same as un; yet dis rather imports contrary than privation, since it answers to the Latin preposition de. Mis insinuates some error, and for the most part may be rendered by the Latin words male or per per.

To like, to dislike; honour, dishonour; to honour, to grace, to dishonour, to disgrace; to deign, to disdain; chance, hap, mischance, mishap; to take, to mistake; deed, misdeed; to use, to misuse; to employ, to misemploy; to apply, to misapply.

Words derived from Latin written with de or dis retain the same signification; as distinguish, distinguishing; detract, detracting; defines, defamo; de-fain, define, define.

The termination ly added to substantives, and sometimes to adjectives, forms adjectives that import some kind of similitude or agreement, being formed by contraction of like or like.

A giant, giant-like; earth, earthly; heaven, heavenly; world, worldly; God, godly; good, goodly.

The same termination ly added to adjectives, forms adverbs of like signification; as beautiful, beautifully; sweet, sweetly, that is, in a beautiful manner; with some degree of sweetness.

The termination ish added to adjectives, imports diminution; and to adjectives, imports similitude or tendency to a character; as green, greenish; white, whitish; soft, softish; a thief, thiefish; a wolf, wolfish; a child, childish.

We have forms of diminutives in substantives, though not frequent; as a hill, a hillock; a cock, a cockrel; a pike, a pipkin; and thus Halkin, whence the patronymic, Hawkins, Wilkin, Whinkin, and others.

Yet still there is another form of diminution among the English, by lengthening the sound itself, especially of vowels; as there is a form of augmenting them by enlarging, or even lengthening it; and that sometimes so much by change of the letters, as of their pronunciation; as, as sup, sip, sop, sup, sippet, which is besides the termination of the vowel, there is added the French termination et; top, sip, spot; bole, booby, bobby; bwaise; great pronounced especially with a stronger sound, great; little pronounced long, leettle; ting, tang, long, imports a succession of smaller and then greater sounds; and so in tangle, tangle, tangle, and many other made words.

Much harm of this is arbitrary and fanciful, depending wholly on oral use, and therefore scarcely worthy the notice of Wallis.

There are other abstracts, partly derived from the adjectives, and partly from verbs, which are formed by the addition of the termination th, a small change being sometimes made; as long, length; strong, strength; broad, breadth; wide, width; deep, depth; true, truth; warm, warmth; dear, dearth; slow, slowness; dear, dearth; heal, health; well, weal, wealth; dry, drought; young, youth; and so noon, month.

Like these are some words derived from verbs; die, death, till, tillth, grow, growth, grow, now, maw, after mouth; pollen, pollen, pollen, written later math, after math; steal, stealth; bear, birth; rue, ruth; and probably earth, from to ear or plow; fly, flight; weigh, weight; fray, fright; to draw, draught.

These should rather be written fright, fright, only that custom will not suffer it to be twice repeated.

The same form retain faith, sight, breath, health, breast, birth, health, worth, light, weight, and the like, whose primitives are either entirely obsolete; or seldom occur. Perhaps they are derived from sey or sey, styg, styg, seynt, seynt, seynt.

Some ending in ship imply an office, employment, or condition; as kingship, wordship, guardianship, partnership, stewardship, headship, lordship.

Thus worship, that is, worship; whence worshipful, and to worship.

Some few ending in dom, rick, veik, do especially denote dominion, at least state or condition; as kingdom, dukedom, earldom, principedom, popeedom, christendom, freedom, whoredom, bishoprick, bailieveck.

Ment and age are plainly French terminations, and are of the same import with us as among them, scarcely ever occurring, except in words derived from the French, as command- ment, name.

They are in English often long trains of words allied by their meaning and derivation; as to beat, a bat, bottom, a battery, a battle, a battle-door, tabbert, batter, a kind of glutinous composition for food, made by beating different juices into one mass. All these are of similar signification, and perhaps derived from the Latin batua. Thus take, touch, tickle, tack, tackle; all imply a local con junction, from the Latin tango, tecii, tactum.

From two are formed twins, twin, twenties, twelver, twine, twain, twint, twit, twix, twixt, twin, twinge, between, betwixt, betwixt.

The following remarks, extracted from Wallis, are ingenious, but of more subtlety than solidity, and such as perhaps might in every language be enlarged to such an extent.

So usually imply the one, and what relates to it. From the Latin unus are derived the French un, and the English one; and one is pronounced, as projects the French une, and the English one. As if from the Latin monas, the first transposed, that they may the better correspond, so den are names; and thence are derived many words that relate to the one, as some, some, some, mort, some, more, more, most, least, more, more, more, more, many, many, many, many,

Thus in which may perhaps be derived from the Latin, simo, as sacks, sack, dace, dace; so likewise nap and snug, such, snug.

If implied a blast; as blow, blast, to blast, and, metaphorically, to blow down, to blast, a shock of death, a shock, a blast, to look blank or bluff, blow, blase, bluff, bluster, blear, blater, blacker, blite, blite, bliter, blitter, bluster, blast, blow, to blast, that is, blow, blow; and perhaps blow'd.

In the native words of our tongue is to be found a great agreement between the letters and the thing signified; and therefore the sounds of letters smaller, shorter, softer, stronger, clearer, more obscure, and more stridulous, do very often intonate the like effects in the thing signified.

Thus words that begin with er intonate the force and effect of the thing signified, as if probably derived from epicea, or streams; as strong, strength, strengthen, strengthen, strengthened, stream, streamer, streamer, stream.

Stiffness here, with less degree, so much only is sufficent to preserve what has been already communicated, rather than acquire any new degree; as if it were derived from the Latin stox: for example, stand, that is, to remain, or to prop, stai, that is; to oppose; step, to staff, stave, staff, and stave, to staff.

Stream, streamer, streamer, stream. It is to be noted, that in absence of streamer, stagger, stickle, stike, stake, a sharp pale, and any thing deposited at play; stock, stem, stee, to stink, stick, stick, stoch, stanchion, stick, to stick.

the eminence or the more sound noise, and the more consonant intonates its being suddenly terminated; but by adding to, is made the frequentative particle. The same by adding to, that is per, implies a more lively impulses of diffusing, or expanding itself; to which adding the termination ing it becomes spring; while the termination being, its sharp noise, and the ring, and lastly to being acute and tremulous, ending in the more consonant, denotes the sudden ending of any motion, that it is meant in its primary signification, of a single, not a repeated exhibition. Hence we call spring when there has an elastic force, as also a fountain of water, and thence the origin of any thing; and to spring, to germinate, and spring, one of the four seasons. From the same par and out, is formed spring, and with the termination of, spring; of which the f-blowing, for the most part, is the difference; sprout, of a greater sound imports a fatter or grosser bud; sprig, of a slenderer sound denotes a smaller shoot. In like manner, from steer the word strike, and out, come strait, and strat. From the same steers, and the termination ungle, is made strangle; and this of imports, but without any great noise, by reason of the obscure sound of the vowel u. In like manner, from throw and roll is made troll; and almost in the same sense is trundle, which, trundle, and trundle, the word gron, or gross, is compounded of gron, and rough; and trudge from tread or trud and arge.

In these observations it is easy to discover great sagacity and great extravagance, an ability to do much desired by the deficiency of doing more than enough. It may be remarked, that Wallis's derivations are often so made, that by the same licence any language may be deduced from any other. That he makes no distinction between words immediately derived by us from the Latin, and those which, being copied from other languages, can therefore afford no example of the genius of the English language, or its laws of derivation. That he derives from the Latin, often with great harshness and violence, words apparently Teutonic; and therefore according to his own definition, probably older than the tongue to which he refers them.

That some of his derivations are apparently erroneous.

SYNTACT.

The established practice of grammarians requires that I should here treat of the Syntax; but our language has so little inflection, or variety of terminations, that its construction neither requires nor admits many rules. Wallis therefore has totally neglected it; and Jonson, whose desire of following the writers upon the learned languages, made him think a syntax indispensible necessary, has published such petty observations as were better omitted.

The verb, as in other languages, agrees with the nominative in number and person; as Thou fliest from good; he runs to death.

Our adjectives and pronouns are invariably.

Of two substantives the noun possessive is the genitive; as, His father's glory; The sun's heat.

Verbs transitive require an oblique case; as, He loves me; You fear him.

All prepositions require an oblique case; as, He gave this to me; He took this from me; He says this of me; He came with me.

PROSODY.

It is custom to those that deliver the grammar of modern languages, to omit their Prosody. So that the Hallius is neglected by Buonocore; that of the French by Desanans; and that of the English by Wallis, Cooper, and even by Jonson, though a poet. But as the laws of metre are included in the idea of a grammar, I have thought it proper to insert them.

Prosody comprises orthoepy, or the rules of pronunciation; and orthometry, or the laws of versification.

Prosody is just, when every letter has its proper sound, and when every syllable has its proper accent, or, which in English versification is the same, its proper quantity.

The sounds of the letters have been already explained; and rules for the accent or quantity are not easily to be given, being subject to innumerable exceptions. The tone, in which I have read the formed, I shall here propose.

1. Of dissyllables formed by affixing a termination, the former syllable is commonly accented; as, childish, kingdom, detach, act, done, to, some, lover, sculls, father, forness, zealous, father, godly, wickly, artist.

57
A Grammar of the

2. Dissyllables formed by prefixing a syllable to the radical word, have commonly the accent on the latter; as to begôt, to bescem, to bestow.

3. Of dissyllables which are at once nouns and verbs, the verb has commonly the accent on the latter, and the noun on the former syllable; as, to décant, a décant; to cement, a cement; to contract, a contract.

This rule has many exceptions. Though verbs seldom have their accent on the former, yet nouns often have it on the latter syllable; as, delight, performer.

4. All dissyllables ending in y, as crënnī; in our, as lâbour, favour; in our, as willow, willow, except allow; in le, as battle, bible; in ish, as banish; in ek, as cambrick, cassock; in ter, as to båttér; in age, as courage; in en, as fisten; in et, as quiet; accent the former syllable.

5. Dissyllable nouns in er, as cånkér, båttér, have the accent on the former syllable.

6. Dissyllable verbs terminating in a consonant and e final, as comprise, eseρe; or having a diphthong in the last syllable, as appease, reveal; or ending in two consonants, as attended; have the accent on the latter syllable.

7. Dissyllable nouns having a diphthong in the latter syllable, have commonly their accent on the latter syllable, as applaise; except words in air, as certain, mountain.

8. Trisyllables formed by adding a termination, or prefixing a syllable, retain their accent on the radical word, as lœliness, tenderness, contemner, waggouner, physicel, bespatter, commenting, commended, assurance.

9. Trisyllables ending in ous, as gracious, ASHBOARD; in al, as cépital; in ion, as mention; accent the first.

10. Trisyllables ending in er, en; and ate, accent the first syllable, as conourence, contînence, ârmoment, îmînent, éléphant, propogate; except they be derived from words having the accent on the last syllable, as connexance, acquaintance; or the middle syllable hath a vowel before two consonants, as promulgates.

11. Trisyllables ending in y, as éntity, spécify, liberty, victory, subsidy, commonly accent the first syllable.

12. Trisyllables in re or le accent the first syllable, as légible, théâtre; except disciple, and some words which have a position, as exemple, epistle.

13. Trisyllables in ude commonly accent the first syllable, as plenitude.

14. Trisyllables ending in ator or atour, as crédule or crédule; or having in the middle syllable a diphthong, as endoavour; or a vowel before two consonants, as doméstiek; accent the middle syllable.

15. Trisyllables that have their accent on the last syllable are commonly French, as acquiesce, repartie, magazine; or words formed by prefixing one or two syllables to an acute syllable, as immatîre, overcharge.

16. Polysyllables, or words of more than three syllables, follow the accents of the words from which they are derived, as arrogating, continency, incontinency, commended, communicableness. We should therefore say, disputable, indisputable, rather than disputable, indiscussible; and advertisement rather than advertisement.

17. Words in ion have the accent upon the antepenult, as salvation, perturbation, confection; words in autor or ator on the penult, as dedicate.

18. Words ending in le commonly have the accent on the first syllable, as aqueable; unless the second syllable have a vowel before two consonants, as combustible.

19. Words ending in ous have the accent on the antepenult, as uxorious, voluptuous.

20. Words ending in ty have their accent on the antepenult, as pusillanimity, activity.

These rules are not advanced as complete or infallible, but proposed as useful. Almost every rule of every language has its exceptions; and in English, as in other tongues, much must be learned by example and authority. Perhaps more and better rules may be given, that have escaped my observation.

Versification is the arrangement of a certain number of syllables according to certain laws.

The feet of our verses are either iambick, as alóft, crearé; or trochaic, as hóly, lofty.

Our iambick measure comprises verses

Of four syllables,

Most good, most fair,
Or things as rare,
To call you's lost;
For all the cost
Words can bestow,
So poorly show
Upon your praise,
That all the ways
Sense hath, come short.

Drayton.

Dryden.

Of six,

This while we are abroad,
Shall we not touch our lyre?
Shall we not sing an ode?
Shall that holy fire
In us that strongly glow'd,
In this cold air expire?

Though in the utmost Peak
A while we do remain,
Amidst the mountains bleak,
Expos'd to sleet and rain;
No sport our hours shall break,'
To exercise our vein.

What though bright Phebus' beams
Refresh the southern ground,
And though the princely Thames
With beauteous nymphs abound,
And by old Camber's streams
Be many wonders found.

Yet many rivers clear
Here glide in silver swathes;
And what of all most dear,
Buxton's delicious baths,
Strong ale and noble cheer,
To assure breem winter's scaths.

In places far and near,
Or famous or obscure,
Where wholesome is the air,
Or where the most impure,
All times and every where,
The muse is still in ure.

Drayton.
Of eight, which is the usual measure of short poems,
And may at last my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage,
The hairy gown, and mossy cell,
Where I may sit and nightly spell
Of ev'ry star the sky doth shew,
And ev'ry herb that sips the dew.

Of ten, which is the common measure of heroic and tragick poetry,

Full in the midst of this created space,
Betwixt heav'n, earth, and skies, there stands a place
Confining on all three: with triple bound;
Whence all things, though remote, are view'd around,
And thither bring their undulating sound.
The palace of loud fame, her seat of pow'r,
Plac'd on the summit of a lofty tow'r,
A thousand winding entries, long and wide
Receive of fresh reports a flowing tide;
A thousand crannies in the walls are made;
Nor gate nor bars exclude the busy trade.
'T is built of brass, the better to diffuse
The spreading sounds, and multiply the news;
Where echoes in repeated echoes play:
A mart for ever full; and open night and day.
Nor silence is within, nor voice express,
But a deaf noise of sounds that never cease:
Confus'd and chiding, like the hollow roar
Of tides receding from the insulted shore;
Or like the broken thunder, heard from far,
When Jove to distance drives the rolling war.
The courts are fill'd with a tumultuous din
Of crowds, or issuing forth, or ent'ring in:
A thorough-fare of news; where some devise Things never heard, some mingle truth with lies:
The troubled air with empty sounds they beat,
Intent to hear, and eager to repeat.

In these measures the accents are to be placed on even syllables; and every line considered by itself is more harmonious as this rule is more strictly observed. The variations necessary to pleasure belong to the art of poetry, not to the rules of grammar.

Our trochaick measures are

Of three syllables,
Here we may Think and pray,
Before death
Stopes our breath:
Other joys
Are but toys.  Walton's Angler.

Of five,
In the days of old,
Stories plainly told,
Lovers felt annoy.

Old Ballad.

Of seven,
Fairest piece of well-form'd earth,
Urge not thus your haughty birth.

Waller.

In these measures the accent is to be placed on the odd syllables.
A GRAMMAR OF THE

In that of seven.
For resistance I could fear none,
But with twenty ships had done
What thou, brave and happy Vernon,
Hast achieve'd with six alone.

In that of six.
'Twas when the seas were roaring,
With hollow blasts of wind,
A damsel lay deploring.
All on a rock reclin'd.

In the anapestick,
When terrible tempests assail us,
And mountainous billows alight,
Nor power nor wealth can avail us,
But skillful industry steers right.

To these measures, and their laws, may be reduced every species of English verse.

Our versification admits of few licences, except a synallapha, or elision of e in the before a vowel, as th' eternal; and more rarely of o in to, as t' accept; and a synaeresis, by which two short vowels coalesce into one syllable, as question, special; or a word is contracted by the expulsion of a short vowel before a liquid, as av'rice, temp'rance.

Thus have I collected rules and examples by which the English language may be learned, if the reader be already acquainted with grammatical terms, or taught by a master to those that are more ignorant. To have written a grammar for such as are not yet initiated in the schools, would have been tedious, and perhaps at last ineffectual.

THE first letter of the European alphabets, has, in the English language, three different sounds; which may be termed the broad, open, and slender.

The broad sound, resembling that of the German a, is found in many of our monosyllabics, as all, wall, mall, salt; in which a is pronounced as aw in cause, or aw in law. Many of these words were anciently written with au, as fault, seaulk; which happens to be still retained in fault. This was probably the ancient sound of the Saxons, since it is almost uniformly preserved in the rustic pronunciation and the northern dialects, as maw for man, haund for hand.

A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c.

A, slender, or close, is the peculiar a of the English language, resembling the sound of the French e masculine, or diphthong ai in pois; or perhaps a middle sound between them, or between the a and e: to this the Arabic a is said nearly to approach. Of this sound we have examples in the words place, face, waste; and all those that terminate in ation, as relation, nation, generation.

A is short, as glass, grass; or long, as glaze, grase: it is marked long, generally by an e final, plane; or by an i added, as plain. The short a is open, the long a close.

1. A, an article set before nouns of the singular number; a man, a tree, denoting the number one; as a man is coming, that is, no more than one; or an indefinite indication, as a man may come this way, that is, any man. This article has no plural signification. Before a word beginning with a vowel, it is written an; as, an ox, an egg, of which a is the contraction.

Vol. I.

2. A, taken materially, or for itself, is a noun; as, a great A, a little a.

3. A is placed before a participle, or participial noun; and is considered by Wallis as a contradiction of at, when it is put before a word denoting some action not yet finished; as, I am a walking. It also seems to be anciently contracted from at, when placed before local surrauases; as, Thomas a Becket. In other cases, it seems to signify to, like the French à.

A hunting Chloe went. Prior.

They go a begging to a bankrupt's door. Dryden.

May peace still slumber by these purling fountains!

Which we may every year
Find, when we come a fishing here. Wetton.

Now the men fell a rubbing of armour, which a great while had lain oiled. Wetton.

He will klap the spears a pieces with his teeth. Mones Antid. Athen.

Another falls a ringing a Pescennius Niger, and judiciously distinguishes the sound of it to be modern. Addison on Medals.

4. A has a peculiar signification, denoting the possession of one thing to another. Thus we say, The landlord hath a hundred a year; The ship's crew gained a thousand pounds a man.

The river Inn passes through a wide open country, during all its course through Bavaria; which is a voyage of two days, after the rate of twenty leagues a day. Addison on Italy.

5. A is used in burlesque poetry, to lengthen out a syllable, without adding to the sense.

For clove and nutmegs to the line-a
And even for oranges to China. Dryden.

6. A is sometimes, in familiar writings, put by a barbarous corruption for he; as, will a come, for will he come.

7. A, in composition, seems to have sometimes the power of the French a in these phrases, a droit, a gauche, &c. and sometimes to be contracted from at; as, aside, aslope, afoot, asleep, athirst, awake.

I gin to be a weary of the sun;
And wish the state of th' world were now undone. Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream.
ABANDONED, particip. adj. Corrupted in the highest degree; as, an abandoned wretch. In this sense, it is a contraction of a longer form, abandoned [given up] to wickedness.

ABANDONING. [A verbal noun from abandon.] Desertion, forsaking.

He hoped his past meritorious actions might outweigh his present abandoning the thought of future action. Clarend. b. viii.

ABANDONMENTS. [abandonment, Fr.]
1. The act of abandoning.
2. The state of being abandoned. Dict.

ABANNITION. n. s. [Lat. abannitio.] A banishment for one or two years, for

To ABARGE, v. a. [abapian Sax.] To make bare, uncover, or disclose. Dict.

ABARTICULATION. n. s. [from ab, from,
and articulus, a joint, Lat.] A bad and apt construction of the bones, by which they move strongly and easily; or that species of articulation that has manifest motion. Dict.

To ABASE, v. a. [Fr. abaisser, from the Lat. basis, or bassus, a barbarous word, signifying low, base.]
1. To depress, to lower.
It is a point of cunning to wait upon him with whom you speak with your eye; yet with a decent showing of it sometimes. Bacon.

2. To cast down, to depress, to bring low, in a figurative and personal sense, which is the common use.
Happy shepherd, to the gods he thankful, that to thy advancement their wisdoms have thee abased.
Behold every one that is proud, and abase him.
Job, xli. 11.

With unresisted might the monarch enrolls;
He levels mountains, and he raises plains;
And, regarding difference of degree,
Abate your daughter and exalted me.
Dryd. En. 3.

If the mind be burred and humbled too much in children; if their spirits be abated and broken most of them over them: they lose all their vigour and industry. Locke on Educ. §. 40.

ABAS'ED. adj. [with heralds] a term used of the wings of eagles, when the top looks downwards towards the point of the shield; or when the wings are shut;
the natural way of bearing them being spread with the toppointing to the chief of the angle. Bailey. Chambers ABATEMENT. n. s. The state of being brought low; the act of bringing low; depression.

There is an abatement because of glory;
and there is that lifteth up his head from a low estate, Ecclesiasticus, x. 11.

To ABASH. v. a. [See BASHFUL. Perhaps from abissir, French.]
1. To put into confusion; to make ashamed. It generally implies a sudden impression of shame.
They heard, and were abash'd.
Milton's Paradise Lost, b. i. l. 531.

This heard th' imperfect queen sat mute with
Nor further dust incense the gloomy thunderer. Silence was in the court at this rebuke:
Nor could the gods, aba'st'd, sustain their sover-reign's look.
Dryden's Fables
2. The passive admits the particles at sometimes of, before the casual noun.

To ABATEN. v. a. [abatement, Fr.]
1. The act of abating or lessening.
Xenophon tells us, that the city contained about ten thousand houses; and allowing one man to ABB

every house, who could have any share in the government (the rest consisting of women, children, and servants), and making other obvious abatements, these tyrants, if they had been near one quarter of its weight, might have been a majority even of the people collective.

Swift on the Conduct of Athens and Rome.

2. The state of being abated.

Coffee has, in common with all nuts, an oil strongly combined and entangled with earthy particles. The most noxious part of the oil exists in roasting, to the abatement of under one quarter of its weight. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. The sum or quantity taken away by the act of abating.

The law of works is that law, which requires perfect obedience, without remission or exception; so that, by that law, a man cannot be just, or justified, without an achievement of every title.

Lecky.

4. The cause of abating; extermination.

As our advantages towards practising and promoting piety and virtue were greater than those of other men; so will our excuse be, if we neglect to make use of them. We cannot plead in abatement of our guilt, that we were ignorant of our duty, under the imposition of Hikhabits, and the bias of a wrong education. Atterbury's Sermons.

5. [In law.] The act of the abator; as, the abatement of the heir into the land before he hath agreed with the lord. The affection or passion of the thing abated; as, abatement of the writ. Corwell.

6. [With heralds.] An accidental mark, which being added to a coat of arms, the dignity of it is abasement, by reason of some stain or disadvantageous quality of the bearer.

Abbath, n. s. [A law term] One who intrudes into houses or land, void by the death of the former possessor, and yet not entered upon or taken up by his heir.

Dict.

ABBAD, n. s. [Old records.] Any thing diminished.

ABBAD, n. s. The yarn on a weaver's warp, a term among clothiers.

Chambers. ABBAD, n. s. [Heb. 2Na] A Syriac word, which signifies to subdue, to lead captive. Abbad, n. s. [Lat. abbatia.] The rights or privileges of an abbot. See ABBAY.

According to Fenius, an abbacy is the dignity itself, since, an abbot is a term or word of dignity, and not of office; and, therefore, even a secular person, who has the care of souls, is sometimes, in the canon law, also styled an abbot.

Ashby.

ABBAD, n. s. [Lat. abbatia, from whence the Saxon abswyr], then probably аббава, and by contraction аббава in Fr. and аббава, Eng.] The superior or governor, of a nunnery or monastery of women.

They fled into this abbey, whither we pursued them; and here the abbatia shut the gate on us, and will not suffer us to fetch him out.

Shake, Com. of Errors.

ABBAD.

I have a sister, abbad in Terceran, Who lost her lover on her bridal day.

Drak. D. Sebatt.

Constantia, as soon as the solemnities of her reparation were over, retired with the abbas into her own apartment.

Addison.

ABBAD, n. s. [Lat. abbatia; from whence probably first abbreviabat; which see.] A monastic for religious persons, whether of men or women; distinguished from religious houses of other denominations by larger privileges. See ABBOT.

With easy roads he came to Leicester; Lodged in the abbey, where he revered abbat. With all his divert, honourably received in his society. Shak.

ABBAD-LUBER, n. s. [See LUBER.] A slowth loiterer in a religious house, under pretence of retirement and austerity.

This is no Father Dominic, no huge overgrown abbad-luber; this is but a diminutive person. Drak. Sp. Fr.

ABBAD, n. s. [In the lower Latin abbas, from 2Na, father, which sense was still implied; so that the abbas were called patres, and abasses matres monasterii. Thus Fortunatus to the abbat Peturnus, Nominis officium, Paternae, geris.] The chief of a convent, or fellowship of canons. Of these, some in England were mitred, some not: those that were mitred, were exempted from the jurisdiction of the diocesan, having in themselves episcopal authority within their precincts, and being also lords of parliament. The other sort were subject to the diocesan in all spiritual government.

Corwell.

See ABBAD.

ABBADSHIP, n. s. The state or privilege of an abbat.

Dict.

To ABBREVIAE, v. a. [Lat. abbreviare.] To abbreviate, to shorten; to make the main substance; to abridge.

It is one thing to abbreviate by contracting, another by cutting out. Shakes.

The only invention of late years, which hath contributed towards politeness in discourse, is that of abbreviating or reducing words of many syllables into one, by lopping off the rest. Swift.

2. To shorten; to cut short.

Let the length of their days before the flood; which were abbreviated after, and contracted into hundreds and thousands.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. iv. c. 6.

Abridgment of part, deprived of, cut short.
A B S

ABRUPTION. n. s. [abraduo, Lat.] Breaking off, violent and sudden separation. Those, which are inclosed in stone, marble, or such other solid matter; being differently separable from it, because of its adhesion to all sides of them, we commonly remove some of that matter still adhering to them, or at least marks of its abruption from them, on all their sides.

A B RU T L Y. adv. [See A BR U P T.] Hastily, without the due forms of preparation. The sweetness of virtue's disposition, jealous even over itself, suffered her not to enter abruptly into questions of Musidora. Sidney, ii. ii. Now missing from their joy, so lately found, So lately found, and so abruptly gone.

A B R U T P E S S. n. s. [from abrupt.] 1. An abrupt manner, haste, suddenness, utmost vehemence. 2. The state of an abrupt or broken thing: roughness, cragginess; as of a fragment violently disjointed. The crystalized bodies, found in the perpendicular interstices, have always their roots, as the jellys call it; which is only the abruptness at the end of the body, whereby it adhered to the stone or sides of the intervals; which abruptness caused by its being broke off from the said stone.

A B S C E S S. n. s. [abcapsus, Lat.] A morbid cavity in the body; a tumour, filled with matter; a term of chirurgery. If the patient is not relieved, nor dies, in eight days; the inflammation ends in a suppuration, and an abscess in the lungs, and sometimes in some other part of the body. Arthus, of Diet.

A B S C I S S A. [Lat.] Part of the diameter of a conic section, intercepted between the vertex and a semi-ordinate.

A B S C I S S I O N. n. s. [absection, Lat.] 1. The act of cutting off. Fabrics ab Aquapendente renders the absection of them difficult enough, and not without danger. Wickersham's Surgery. 2. The state of being cut off. By cessation of oracles, with Moutacius, we may understand this intercession, not absection or consommate dissolution. Harvay, on Confirmation.

T O A B S C O N D. v. a. To hide one's self; to retire from the public view: generally used of persons in debt, or criminals eluding the law. The marmotte or mus alpinus, which abscends all winter, lives on its own fat: for in autumn, when it shuts itself up in its hole, it is very fat, and when it comes forth again, very lean. Ray on Creation.

A B S C O N D E R. n. s. [from abscond.] The person that absconds.

A B S C O N D E R E. n. s. [See Absent.] 1. The state of being absent, opposed to presence. Sir, 'tis fit, you have strong party to defend yourself, By calmsness, or by absence; all's in danger. His friends beheld, and pity'd him in vain, For, what advice can ease a lover's pain? Absence, the best expeditious they could find, Might save the fortune, if not care the mind. Dryd. Fal.

You have given no dissertation upon the absence of lovers: nor laid down any methods, how they should support themselves under those separations. Addison, Spectator, No. 241.

WANT OF APPEARANCE IN THE LEGAL SENSE. Absence is of a fourfold kind or species. The first is a necessary absence, as in banished persons; this is entirely necessary. A second, necessary and voluntary; as upon the account of the commonwealth, or in the service of the church. The third kind the civilians call a probable absence: as, that of students on the score of study. And the fourth, an absence entirely voluntary; as, on the account of trade, merchandise, and the like. Some add a fifth kind of absence, which is committed by a man's non-appearance on a citation; as in a continuance person, who, in absentia to his contumacy, is (by the law) in some respects, regarded as present. Ayliffe's Parergon Juris Canones.

I continued my walk, reflecting on the little absences and distractions of mankind. Absent of his mother oft he'll mourn; And, with his eyes, look wishes to return. Dryd. A. V. S. ii.

A B S E N T. adj. [absens, Lat.] 1. Not present: used with the particle from. In spring the fields, in autumn hills I love; At noon the plains, at noon the shady grove; But Deja always: absent from her sight, Nor plains at noon, nor groves at moonlight. Pope's Past. Where there is advantage to be given, Both more and less have given him the revolt; And none serve, who by a man's non-appearance things: Whose hearts are absent too. Shakes. Macbeth. Whether they were absent or present, they were used alike. Wilt. v. 11.

2. Absent in mind, inattentive; regardless of the present object. I distinguish a man that is absent, because he thinks of something else; from him that is absent, because he is not attentive. Addis. Spec. No. 72.

T O A B S C R I D. v. a. To withdraw, to forbear to come into presence. If thou disrest ever hold me in thy heart, Absent thee from felicity a while; And in this harsh world draw thy brevis in pain. To tell my tale. Shakespeare's Hamlet. Go! for thy stay, not free, absente thee more. Milton's Paradise Lost, b. ix. 1. 392.

The I am forced thus to absent myself, From all I love; I shall contrive some means, Some friendly intervals, to visit thee.

The Areno is still called together in cases of importance: and if, after due summons, any necer auxiliary himself, he is absolved to the value of about a penny English. Addison's Rem. on Italy.

A B S E N T E E. n. s. He that is absent from his station, or employment, or country. A word used commonly with regard to Irishmen, living out of their country. Then was the first state made against absences; commanding all such shall land in Ireland, to return and reside therupon. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

T O A B S T E R. v. n. [abster, Lat.] To stand off, to leave off.

T O A B S O L V E. v. a. [absolver, Lat.] 1. To clear, to acquit of a crime, in a judicial sense. Your great goodness, out of holy pity, absolve'd him with an axe. Shakes. Henry VIII. Our victors, hlest in peace, forget their wars, Enjoy past dangers, and absolve the stars. Tickell. As he hopes, and gives out, by the influence of his wealth to be here absolved; in condemning this man, you have an opportunity of helping that general scandal of retracting the credit lost by former judgments. Sellig's Miscellaneous.

2. To set free from an engagement or promise. Compell'd by threats to take that bloody oath, And the act ill, I am absolve'd by both, Wilt's Bland's Tragedy. This command, which must necessarily, comprehended the persons of our natural fathers, must unus a duty we owe from our obedience to the magistrate, and from which the most absolute power of princes cannot absolve us. Locke.

3. To pronounce sin remitted, in the ecclesiastical sense. But all is calm, in this eternal sleep: Here grief forgets its spur, and love to weep; Ev'n superstition loses every fear; For God, not man, absolves our frailties here.

4. To finish, to complete. This use is not common.

What cause Mov'd the Creator, in his holy rest Through all eternity, so late to build In chaos: and the work begun, how soon Absod.' Milton's Paradise Lost, b. vii. 1. 94. If that, which is so supposed infinitely distant from what is now current, is distant from us by a finite interval, and not infinitely; then that one circulation, which preceded it, must necessarily be like ours; and consequently protracted in the space of twenty-four hours. Vale's Origin of Mankind.

A B S O L U T E. adj. [absolutus, Lat.] 1. Complete; applied, as well to persons, as to things.

Because the things that proceed from him are perfect, without any manner of defect or main; it cannot be, but that the words of his mouth are absolute and lack nothing which they shd have, for performance of that thing whereunto they tend. Hooker, b. ii. 6.

What is his strength by land?—Great and increasing: but by sea

He is an absolute master. Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra.

2. Unconditional; as an absolute promise. Although it runs in form absolute, yet it is indeed conditional; as depending upon the qualification of the person, to whom it is pronounced. South's Sermons.

3. Not relative; as, absolute space.

I see still the distinctions of sovereign and inferior, of absolute and relative worship, will bear in the worship of any creature with respect to God; as well at least, as it doth in the worship of images. Stilling. Def. of Dice, on Rom. Idol.

An absolute mode is that, which belongs to its subject, without respect to any other beings whatsoever; but a relative mode is derived from the regard, that one being has to others. Watti's Logic.
ABSOLUTELY, adv. [from absolute.]
1. Completely, without restriction.
2. Without relation; in a state unconnected.
3. Without limits or dependence.
4. Without condition.
5. Peremptorily; positively.

A. S. B. L. [absolute, Lat.]
1. Absolute, in the civil law, imports a full absolute, in case of a person by some final sentence of law; and, also a temporary discharge of his farther attendance upon a person, by failure or defect in pleading; as it does likewise in the canon law; where, and among divines, it likewise signifies a relaxation of him from the obligation of some sentence, pronounced either in a court of law, or else in face pudendi. Thus there is, in this kind of law, one kind of absolution, termed judicial; and another, styled a declaration of extrajudicial absolution.

2. The remission of sins, or penance, declared by ecclesiastical authority.

The absolution pronounced by a priest, whether papist or protestant, is not a certain infallible ground to give the person, so absolved, confidence towards God.

A. B. T. [abstergo, L.]
To ABSTAIN, v. a. [abstergo, Lat. preter. absorbed; part. pret. absorbed, or absorbed.]
1. To swallow up.
2. To suck up. See A. B. R. E. N. [absorbens, Lat.]
A medicine that, by the softness or porosity of its parts, either the aspersities of pungent humours, or dries away superfluous moisture in the body.

A. B. T. S. [abstergo, L.]
The act of cleansing. See A. B. R. E. N. To cleanse, to purify; a word very little in use, and less analogical than abstrage.

Nor will we affirm, that iron received, in the stomach of the ostrich, no alteration; but we suspect this effect, rather from corrosion than digestion, and any tendency to chelation by the natural heat, but rather some attrition from an acid and vitriolic-humour in the stomach, which may abate and shave the several parts most necessary to come into danger. Burnet's Law.

The act of cleansing. See A. B. R. E. N. Abstraction is plainly a scouring off, or incision of those viscid humours, and making the humours more fluid, and cutting between them and the part; as in found in nitrous water, which scourish linen cloth speedily from the fouling. Bacon's Nat. Hist. No. 42.
ABSTINENT. n. s. [abstinens, Lat.]

1. Abstinent, adj. [abstinent, Lat.] That uses abstinence; in opposition to covetous, rapacious, or luxurious. It is used chiefly of persons.

ABSTRACTION. n. s. The same with Abstinence.

Were our rewards, for the abstractions or hints of this present life, under the pretense of short or finite; the promises and threats of Christ would lose much of their virtue and energy.

Hammoud's Fundam.

ABSTRACTOR. adj. [abstractor, Lat.] Forced away; wrung from another by violence.

Dict.

To ABSTRACT. v. a. [abstraho, Lat.]

1. Take one thing from another.

Could we abstract from these pernicious effects, and suppose this was innocent; it would be too light, to be matter of praise.

Decay of Piety.

2. To separate by distillation.

Having deplored the spirit of soil, and partly abstracted the whole spirit, there remained in the retort a stypical substance.

Boyle.

3. To separate ideas.

Those, who cannot distinguish, compare, and abstact, necessarily find it extremely difficult to understand and make use of language, or judge or reason to any tolerable degree.

Leckie.

4. To reduce to an epitome.

If we would fix in the memory the discourses we hear, or what we design to speak; let us abstract them into brief compendiums, and review them often.

Watt's Imp. of the Mind.

ABSTRACT. adj. [abstractus, Lat. See the verb To Abstract.

1. Separated from something else; generally used with relation to mental perceptions; as, abstract mathematics, abstract terms, in opposition to concrete.
For well I wot, most mighty sovereign,
That all this famous antique history,
Of some th' abundance of an idle brain
Will judged be, and painted forgery.

ABUNDANT. adj. [abundant, Lat.]
1. Plentiful.
   Good, the more
   Communicated, more abundant grows;
   The author not impaire'd, but honour'd more.
   _Paradise Lost, b. v._

2. Exuberant.
   If the vessels are in a state of too great rigidity,
   so as not to yield; a strong projectile motion occasions their rupture, and hemorrhages;
   especially in the lungs, where the blood is abundant.
   _Arab. on Aliments._

3. Fully stored. It is followed sometimes by _in_ or _by_ commonly with _with_.
   The world began but some ages, before these were found out; and was abundant with all things at first, and men not very numerous; and therefore were not put so much to the use of their wits, to find out ways for living commodiously.
   _Burnet._

4. It is applied generally to things, sometimes to persons,
   The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth.
   _Exod. xxxiv. 6._

ABUNDANTLY. adv. [from abundant.
1. In plenty.
   Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life.
   _Genesis, 1. 20._
   God loatheth
   Abundantly his gifts hath also pour'd;
   Inward and outward both, his image fair.
   _Paradise Lost, b. vii._

2. Amply, liberally, more than sufficiently.
   Ye saw the French tongue abundantly purified.
   _Sprat._
   Heroic poetry has ever been esteemed the greatest work of human nature. In that rank has Aristotle placed it; and Longinus is so full of the like expressions, that he abundantly confirms the other's testimony.
   _Dryd. State of Language, Pref._
   What the example of our equals wants of authority, is abundantly supplied in the imaginations of friendship, and the repeated influences of a constant conversation.
   _Rogers's Serm._

To ABUSE. r. a. [abutor, abusus, Lat.]
1. In abuse the _s_ has the sound of _z_; in the noun, the common sound.
2. To make an ill use of.
   That they use this world, as not abusing it; for the fashion of this world passeth away. _Cor. vii. 31._
   He has fixed and determined the time for our repentance, beyond which he will no longer wait the perverseness of men, no longer suffer his compassion to be abused.
   _Rogers's Sermons._

2. To violate; to defile.
   Anarched figure how Jove did abuse
   Europas like a bull, and on his back
   Her through the sea did bear.
   _Spenser._

3. To deceive; to impose upon.
   Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
   As he is very potent with such spirits,
   Abuses me to damn me.
   _Shaks. Hamlet._

The world hath been much abused by the opinion of making gold; the work itself I judge to be possible; but the means, hitherto propounded, are in the practice full of error.

Brown's Natural History, No. 196.

It imports the misrepresentations of the qualities of things and actions to the common apprehensions of men, abusing their minds with false notions; and so, by this artifice, making evil pass for good, and good for evil, in all the great concerns of life.

South's Sermons.

Nor be with all these tempting words abuse'd;
These tempting words were all to Sappho us'd.
   _Pope._

4. To treat with rudeness; to reproach.
   I am no strumpet; but let us be honest
   As you that thus abuse me.
   _Shakesp. Othello._

But he mocked them, and laughed at them;
and abused them shamefully, and spake proudly.
   _1 Mac. vii. 34._

Some praise at morning, what they blame at night;
But always think the last opinion right.
A muse by these is, like a mistress, us'd;
This hour she's idoless, the next abuse'd.
   _Pope's Essay on Criticism._

The next criticism seems to be introduced for no other reason, but to mention Mr. Bickerstaff, whom the author wants every endeavor for, to imitate and abuse.
   _Addison._

ABUSE. n. s. [from the verb abuse.
1. The ill use of any thing.
   The casting away things profitable for the sustenance of man's life, is an unthankful abuse of the fruits of God's good providence towards mankind.
   _Hooker, b. v. § 9._

Little knows
Any, but God alone, to value right.
The good before him, but perverts best things
To worst abuse, or to their meanest use.
   _Paradise Lost, b. iv._

2. A corrupt practice, bad custom.
   The nature of things is such: that if abuses be not remedied, they will certainly increase.
   _Swift for Advancement of Religion._

3. Seduction.
   Was it not enough for him, to have deceived me; and, through the deceit, abused me; and, after abuse, forsaken me, that he must now, of all the company, and before all the company, lay want of beauty to my charge.

4. Unjust censure, rude reproach, contumely.
   1 dark in light, expe'd
   To daily fraud, contemn, abuse, and wrong.
   _Dieu_ the vengeance of all sinners.

ABUSER. n. s. [from the verb abuse.
1. He that makes an ill use.
2. He that deceives.
   _Swift's Miscel._

3. He that reproaches with rudeness.
   _Denham's Sop._

4. A ravisher, a violator.

ABUSIVE. adj. [from abuse.
1. Practising abuse.
   The tongue whose gently first, and speech was low;
   Till wrangling science taught it noise and show,
   And wicked wit arose, thy most abusive foe.
   _Pope's Miscellanies._

Dame Nature, as the learned show,
Provides each animal its food.
   Hounds hunt the hare; the wily fox
   Devours your geese, the wolf your flocks;
   Thus envy pleads a natural claim
   To persecute the muse's fame;
   On poets, in all times, abuse;
   From Homer, down to Pope's, inclusive.
   _Swift's Miscel._

2. Containing abuse; as, an abusive lampoon.
   Next, Comedy appears with great applause,
   Till her licentious and abusive tongue
   Waken'd the magistrate's exercise power.
   _Roden._

3. Deceitful; a sense little used, yet not improper.
   It is verified, by a number of examples; that whatsoever is gained by an abusive treatise, ought to be restored in severer.
   _Bacon's Considera. on War with Spain._

ABUSIVELY. adv. [from abuse.
1. Improperly, by a wrong use.
   The oil (abusive called spirit) of rose swams at the top of the water, in the form of a white bubble;
   which I remember not to have observed in any other oil drawn in any Limbeck.
   _Bryce's Sceptrum._

2. Reproachfully.
ACATALECTIC. n. s. [ακταλέκτικος, Gr.] A verse, which has the complete number of syllables, without defect or superfluity.

TO ACCEDTO. r. a. [accedo, Lat.] To be added to, to come to; generally used in political accounts; as, another power has acceded to the treaty; that is, has become a party.

ACCELERATE. r. n. [accelero, Lat.] To make quick, to hasten, to quicken motion; to give to the spirit a more impulsive motion, so as perpetually to increase.

Take new beer, and put in some quantity of stale beer into it; and see whether it will not accelerate the clarification, by opening the body of the beer, whereby the grosser parts may fall down into lees.

BARON'S Natural History, No. 307.

By a skilful application of those measures, may he accelerate the riper, and improve the quality of the fruit, and the emptying of mince, at much more easy rates, than by the common methods. GNOMONIC, Sequoia.

He may cause them to arrive from the deepest part of the vibration; they may be accelerated and retarded, by the vibrations overakiing them.

Newton's Optics.

Spices quicken the pulse, and accelerate the motion of the blood, and disperse the fluids; from whence leanness, pains in the stomach, heatings, and fever, sometimes called Hilarious.

Lo! from the dread immensity of space, returning, with accelerated course, The rushing comet to the subsequents.

THOMPSON, Sam. I. 600.

2. It is generally applied to matter, and used chiefly in philosophical language; but is sometimes used on other occasions.

In which country the king himself (whose continental vigilantry did much cause those suspicions, which few else knew inclined to the accelerating a battle.

BARON'S Henry VII.

Perhaps it may point out to a student now and then, what may employ the most useful labours of his thoughts, and accelerate his diligence in the most numerous enquiries.

HATTS. ACCELERATION. n. s. [acceleration, Lat.]

1. The act of quickening motion.

The law of the acceleration of falling bodies, discovered first by Galileo, is; that the velocities, acquired by falling, being as the time in which the body falls from the spaces, through which it passes, will be as the squares of the velocities; and that the velocity and time taken together, as in a quadrature of the spaces.

2. The state of the body accelerated, or quickened in its motion.

The degrees of acceleration of motion, the gravitation of the air, the existence or non-existence of empty spaces, either concave or intersected, and many the like, have taken up the thoughts and times of men in disputes concerning them.

3. The act of hastening.

Considering the language ensuring that action in some, and the visible acceleration it maketh of age in others, we cannot but think very much abridge.

BROWNE. ACCENDI. r. a. [accendere, Lat.] To kindle, to set on fire; a word very rarely used.

Our devotion, if sufficiently accelerated, would (as their) burn up innumerable books of this sort.

Decay of Forty.

ACCENSION. n. s. [accessio, Lat.] The act of kindling, or the state of being kindled.

The fulminating damp will take fire, at a candle or other flame; and upon its acceleration, gives a crack or report, like the discharge of a gun; and makes an explosion so forcible, as sometimes to kill the miners, and rent and face bodies (of great weight and bulk) from the bottom of the pit or mine.

WOODWARD'S Nat. History.

ACCENT. n.s. [accentus, Lat.]

1. The manner of speaking or pronouncing, with regard either to force or elegance.

I know, Sir, I am no flatterer: he, that beguiled you in a plain accent, was a plain knave; which for my part, I will not be.
Shakespeare, King Lear.

2. The sound, given to the syllables pronounced.

Your accent is something finer, than you could purchase in so removed a dwelling. Shakespeare’s As you like it.

3. In grammar, the marks made upon syllables, to regulate their pronunciation.

Accent, as in the Greek names and usage, seems to have regarded the tone of the voice: the acute accent raising the voice in some syllables to a higher, (i.e. more acute) pitch or tone; and the grave, depressing it lower; and both, having some emphasis, i.e. more vigorous pronunciation. Holinshed.

4. Poetically, language or words.

If we ages hence Shall this our lofty scene be acted o’er, In states unborn, and acts yet unknown. Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar.

Winds! on your wings to heav’n her accents bear! Such words, as heaven alone is able. Dryg. Virg. Past. 3.

5. A modification of the voice, expressive of the passions or sentiments.

The tender accent of a woman’s cry Will pass unheard ; it is a sound that rings. When the rough seaman’s louder shouts prevail, When fair occasion shows the springing gale. To Accent. v.a. [from accentus, Lat.] formerly elevated at the second syllable, now at the first.

1. To pronounce, to speak words with particular regard to the grammatical marks or rules.

Having got some regard to mark the last syllable but one, where it is long, in words above two syllables; which is enough, to regulate her pronunciation, and accenting the words; let her read daily in the gospels, and avoid understanding them in Latin, if she can. Locke on Education, § 177.

2. In poetry; to pronounce or utter in general.

O my unhappy lines! you that before Have serv’d my youth, to vent some wanton cries; And now, like tongues with grief, can scarce improve Strength to accent, Here my Albertus lies! Winck.

3. To write or note the accents.

To Accentuate. v.a. [accentuer, Fr.] To place the proper accents over the vowels.

Accentuation. n.s. [from accentuate.]

1. The act of placing the accent in pronunciation.

2. Marking the accent in writing.

To Accent. v.a. [acepio, Lat. accepter, Fr.]

1. To totake with pleasure; to receivekindly; to admit with approbation. It is distinguished from receive, as specific from general; noting a particular manner of receiving.

Neither do ye kindle fire on my altar for nought. I have no pleasure in you, saith the Lord of hosts, neither will I accept an offering at your hand. Malachi, i. 10.

God is no respecter of persons: but, in every nation, he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him. Acts, x. 35, 36.

You have been graciously pleased to accept this tender of my duty. Dryg. Dedication to his Fables. Charms by accepting, by omitting or avoiding, a thing. Yet have your honour most, when you obey. Pope.

2. It is used in a kind of juridical sense; as, to accept terms, accept a treaty. They slavher’d many of the gentry; for whom no, or age could be accepted excuse. Sidney. His promise Palamedes never gave, but pray’d To keep it better, than the first he made. Dryden’s Fables.

Those, who have defended the true sense of our negotiators at the treaty of Grevynbergh, dwell upon their zeal and patience in endeavouring to work the French up to their demands, but say nothing of the probability, that France would ever accept them. Swift.

3. In the language of the Bible, to accept persons, is to act with personal and partial regard.

He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons.

4. It is sometimes used with the particle of.

If I appraise him with the present, that goeth before me, and afterward I will see his face; peradventure he will accept of me. Job, xiii. 10.

Acceptability. n.s. [from accept.]

1. Reception, whether good or bad. This large sense seems now wholly out of use. Yet, poor soul! I know he no other, but that I do suspect, regard, and esteem him? For, every day, he finds one way or other, to set myself against him; but he is a rash person, the coldness of acceptation. Sidney, b. ii.

What is now, finds better acceptation, than what is good or great. Davenant’s Sophy.

2. Good reception, acceptance.

Cain, envies the acceptation of his brother’s prayer and sacrifice, slew him; making himself the first man-slayer, and his brother the first martyr. Bacon’s History of the World, b. i.

3. The state of being acceptable; regard.

Some things, although not so required of necessity; that, to leave them undone, excludeth from salvation, are, notwithstanding, of so great dignity and acceptation with God, that most ample reward in heaven is laid up for them. Hooker, b. ii:

They have those enjoyments, only as the consequences of the state of censure and acceptation they are in with their parents and governors. Locke on Education, § 33.

4. Acceptance in the juridical sense. This sense occurs rarely.

As, in order to the passing away a thing by gift, there is required a surrender of all right, on his part that gives; so there is required also an acceptation on his part to whom it is given. Smith’s Sermons.

The meaning of a word, as it is commonly received.

Thereupon the earl of Lauderdale made a dispute upon the several usages of the word, and what acceptation these words and expressions had. Clarendon, b. viii.

All matter is either fluid or solid; in a large acceptation of the words; that they may comprehend even all the middle degrees, between extreme fixness and coherency; and the most rigid intestine movement of the particles of bodies. Beccaria’s Crime.

Accepter. n.s. [from accept.] The person that accepts.

Acceptation. n.s. [acceptatio, Lat.] A term of the civil law; importing the remission of a debt, by an acquittance from the creditor; testifying the receipt of money, which has never been paid. Acceptation. n.s. [acceptation, Fr. from accept, Lat.] The received sense of a word; the meaning. Not in use.

That hath been essentially a proper acceptation of this word, I shall testify by one evidence, which gave me the first hint of this receipe. Hammond on Fundamenta’s Access. n.s. [In some of its sense, it seems derived from accessus; in others, from accessus, Lat. acces, Fr.]

1. The way, by which any thing may be approached.
AC

The access of the town was only by a neck of land.

Bacon.

There remained very advantageous accesses, for temptions to enter, and invite men to the fortications being so very slender, little knowledge of in-mortality, or any thing beyond this life; and no assurance, that repetition would be admitted for such a purpose.

Druiden's Eulid. vi.

2. The means, or liberty, of approaching even to things or men.

When we were wrong'd, and would unfold our grifes;

We are den'd access unto his person,

En't b y those men that most have done us wrong.

Shakespeare.

They go, commissioned to receive a peace;
And carry presents, to procure access

Druiden's Eulid, viii. 1. 999.

He grants what they besought;

Instructed, that to God is no access

Without Mediator; who his high office now
Moses in figure bears.

Milton's Par. Lost. b. xii. 1. 229.

3. Increase, enlargement, addition.

The gold was accumulated, and store treasures,
for the most part; but the silver is still growing.

Besides, infinite is the access of territory and enpire, by the same enterprise.

Nor think so, criminals aid

1. from the influence of thy looks, receive access in every virtue; in thy sight
More wise, more watchful, stronger.

Paradise Lost. b. iv. 2.

Although to opinion, there are as many gods, may seen an access in religion, and such as cannot at all consist with atheism; yet doth it deductively, and upon inference, include the same: for unity is the inseparable and essential attribute of Deity.

Brown's Vulgar Errors. b. i. c. 10.

The reputation

Of virtuous actions past, if not kept up
With an access and fresh supply of new ones,
Is lost and soon forgotten.

Denham's Sophy.

4. It is sometimes used, after the French, to signify the returns or fits of a distemper,
but this sense seems yet scarcely received in our language.

For, as expulsions make diseases
More desperate than their first accesses. Hudibras.

ACCESSARINESS. n. s. [from accessary.]
The state of being accessory.

Perhaps this will draw us into a negative access-ariness to the mischiefs. Decay of Piety.

ACCESSARY. adj. [A corruption, as it seems, of the word accessory, which see; but now more commonly used than the proper word.] That which, without being the chief constituent of a crime, contributes to it.
But it had formerly a good and general sense.

As for those things, that are accessory herceto;
those things, that so belong to the way of salvation, &c.

Henderson, b. iii. § 2.

He hath taken upon him the government of Hull, without any pretense or imagination, that it would ever make him accessory to rebellion.

Clavilux. b. viii.

ACCESSIBLE. adj. [accessibilitis, Lat. accessible, Fr.] That which may be approached or reached, that which we may reach or arrive at.
It is applied, both to persons and things, with the particle to.

Some be more open to our senses and daily observation; others are more occult and hidden; and,
through accessible (in some measure) to our senses, yet not without great search and scrutiny, or some happy accident.

Here's Origin of Mankind.

ACCC

Those things, which were indeed inexplicable, have been raked and tortured to discover themseff; while the plainer and more accessible truths, as if defensible while easy, are clouded and obscured.

Decay of Piety.

As an island, we being accessible on every side, and exposed to the fury of pirates; against which it is impossible to fortify ourselves sufficiently, without a power at sea.

Addison's Freethinker.

In conversation, the tamper of men are open and accessible, their attention is awake, and their minds disposed to receive the strongest impressions.
and, what is spoken, is generally more affecting,
and more appropriate to particular occasions.

Regen's Eulid.

ACCESSION. n. s. [accessio, accession, Fr.] 1. Increase, by something added; enlargement, augmentation.

Nor could all the king's bounties, nor his own large accession, raise a fortune to his heir; but, af-fter vast sums of money, and great wealth gotten,
it was unaccomplished.

Clavilux.

There would not have been found the difference (here set down) between the force of the air, when expanded, and what that force should have been,
according to the theory; but that the inclined inch of air receives some additional force, during the trial.

Boyle's Spring of the Air.

The wisest among the nobles began to apprecend that the admission of this or that thing fore, knowing what an accession thereof would accrue to them, by such an addition of property, wasn't an easy task to prevent it.

Regen.

Perhaps, in respect of munificence, are the proper discharge of such over-proportioned accessions, and the only virtuous enjoyment of them.

Regen's Sermons.

2. The act of coming to, or joining one's self to; as, accession to a confederacy
Beside, what wise objections he prepares,
Against any late accession to the wars?

Davies.

Is there no more force against Achilles bent?

Druiden's Fable.

3. The act of arriving at; as, the king's accession to the throne.

ACCESSORILY. adv. [from accessory.]
In the manner of an accessory.

ACCESSORY. adj. Joined to another thing, so as to increase it; additional.

In this kind there is not the least action, but it doeth somewhat more to the accessory augmentation of our bliss.

Henderson.

ACCESSORY. n. s. [accessorius, Lat.
accession, Fr.] This word, which had anec-ditionally a general signification, is now almost confused to forms of law.

1. Applied to persons

A man that is guilty of a felonious offence, not principally but by participation; as, by commandment, advice, or concealment.

And a man may be accessory to the offence of another, after two sorts; by complicity, or by statute; and, by the common law, two ways also; that is, before or after the fact. Before the fact; as, when one commandeth another to commit a felo ny, and is not present at the execution thereof; for his presence makes him also a principal; wherefore that person comes to be accessory before the fact;
in manslaughter, because manslaughter is suddcn and not prepenset. Accesory after the fact is, when one receives him, whom he knoweth to have committed either by statute rule, that abeteth, counsellors, or hides any man committing, or having committed, an offence made felony by statute.

Coke.

By the common law, the accessorius cannot be proceeded against, till the principal has received his trial.

But pause, my soul! and study, ere thou fall
On accidental joys, th' essential.

Still before weerscries da abide
A trial, the means of being try'd.

Denne.
ACC

Thy sin's not accidental, but a trade.
So shall you hear
Of accidental judgments, casual slaughters;
Of deaths, put on by cunning and for'ce caus'd.
-Shakesp. Hamlet.

Look upon things of the most accidental and mutable in nature, in this their condition, and remember in their continuance; yet God's presence of them is as certain in him, as the memory of them is, or can be in us.
South's Sermons.

3. In the following passage, it seems to signify accidental.
Ay, such a minister as wind to fire;
That adds an accidental fierceness to Its natural fury.
-Denham's Sophy.

ACCIDENTALLY. adv. [from accidental.]
1. After an accidental manner; nonessentially.
Other points no less concern the Commonwealth, though but accidentally depending upon the former
I conclude choler accidentally bitter and simonious, but not in itself. Heresoy Consumption.

2. Casually, fortuitously.
Although virtuous men do sometimes accidentally make their way to preferment; yet the world is corrupted, and therefore prudently and hopefully to be rewarded in it, merely upon account of his virtue.
-Swift's Miscellanies.

ACCIDENTALNESS. n.s. from accidental.
The quality of being accidental. Dict.

ACCIDENT. n.s. [accipiet, Lat.] A receiver, perhaps sometimes used for recipient. Dict.

To ACCITE. v. a. [accito, Lat.] To call, to summons; a word, not in use now.
Our coronon done, we will accite
(As I before remember'd) all our state
And (heav'n consign's to my good intents)
No prince, no peer, shall have just cause to say,
Heav'n shorten Harry's happy life one day.
-Shakesp. Henry IV.

ACCLAIM. n.s. [acclamau, Lat. from which probably first the verb acclam, now lost, and then the noun.] A shout of praise, acclamation.
Back from purgatory's Users, with loud acclam,
Thee only extol'd, Millon's Par. Lost, b. iii. l. 397.
The herald ends; the vaudet insignament
With loud acclam and vast applause is rent.
Dryden. Fables.

ACCLAMATION. n.s. [acclamatio, Lat.] Shouts of applause; such as those, with which a victorious army salutes the general.
It hath been the custom of Christian men, in to the greater reverence, to stand, to utter certain words of acclamation; and, at the name of Jesus, to bow.
-Hooker, b. v. s. 29.

Gladdly then be mix'd:
Among those friendly powers, who him receiv'd
With joy and acclamations loud, that one
That of so many rival'd, yet one
Return'd, not lost. Milit. Parod. Lost, b. vi. v. 23.
Such an enchantment is there in words; and so fine a thing, doth seem to some, to be roused plausibly, and to be set red to their destruction with paynegry and acclamation.
-South.

ACCLIVITY. n.s. [from acclivus, Lat.] The steepness or slope of a line inclining to the horizon, reckoned upwards; as, the ascent of a hill is the acclivity, the descent the declivity. Quincy.

The men, leaving their wives and younger children behind, do not without some difficulty climb chamber up the acclivities, dragging their kin with them; where they feed them, and milk them, and make butter and cheese, and do all the drizie-work.
-Bay on the Creation.

ACCLIVIOUS. adj. [acclivus, Lat.] Rising with a slope.

To ACCLY. v. a. [See CLOY.]
1. To fill up, in an ill sense; to crowd, to stuff ful; a word almost obsolete.
At the well head the purest streams arise:
But mucky fill his branching arms amoy's,
And with nely weeds the gentle wave accliv's.
-Fair Queen.

2. To fill to satiety; in which sense, clay is still in use.
They, that escape best in the temperate zone,
Would be filled with long nights, very tending
no less than forty days.
Bay on the Creation.

To ACOIL. v. a. [See COIL.]
To crowd, to keep a coil about, to stuff, to be in a hurry; a word now out of use.
About the cauldron many cooks accoll'd
With books and ladles, as need did require;
The while the vains in the vessel boil'd,
They did about their business scart, and sorely toll'd.
-Accolent. n.s. [accolus, Lat.] He that inhabits near a place; a borderer.

Dict.

ACCOMMODABLE. adj. [accommodabilis, Lat.] That, which may be fitted; with the particle to.
As there is infinite variety in the circumstances of persons, things, actions, times, and places; so we must be furnished with such several rules, that are accommodable to all this variety, by a wise judgment and discretion.
-Witty's Logic.

To ACCOMMODATE. v. a. [accommodate, Lat.]
1. To supply with conveniences of any kind.
It has with before the thing.
These three
The rest do nothing; this word, stand! stand!
Accommodated by the place (more charming
With their own shambles, which could have turn'd
A distuff to a lance) gild'd pale looks.
-Shakesp. Cymbeline.

2. With the particle to; to adapt, to fit, to make consistent with.
He had altered many things:
not that they were not natural before; but that he might accommodate himself, to the age in which he lived.
-Dryden on Dramatic Poetry.

Twas his misfortune, to light upon an hypothesis, that could not be accommodated to the nature of things and humane affairs:
could not be made to agree with that constitution and order, which God hath settled in the world.
-Leake.

3. To reconcile; to adjust; what seems inconsistent or at variance; to make consistent appearance.
Part know how to accommodate St. James and St. Paul, better than some late reconciliers. Norris.

To ACCOMMODATE. v. n. To be conformable to.
They make the particular ensigns of the twelve tribes accommodo unto the twelve signs of the zodiac.
-Brown.

Neither sort of clergyman have duly considered, how great variety there is in the textures and consistencies of compound bodies; and how little the consistence and duration of many of them seem to accommodate and be explicable by the proposed notion.
-Chap.

ACCOMMODATE. adj. [accommodatus, Lat.] Suitable, fit; used sometimes with the particle for, but more frequently with to.
They are so acted and directed by nature, as to cast their eggs in such places as are most accommodo for the exclusion of their young; and where there is food ready for them, so soon as they are hatch'd.
Bay on the Creation.

ACCOMMODATION. n.s. [from accommodate.]
1. Provision of conveniences.

There were a few stagnant reports, industriously by Wood and his acco.'s, to discourage all opposition against his infamous project.
-Swift.

2. In the plural, conveniences, things requisite to ease or refreshment.
The King's commissioners were to have such accommodations, as the other thought fit to leave to them; who had been very civil to the king's commissoinirs.
-Clarendon, b. viii.

3. Adaptation; fitness; with the particle to.
Indeed that disputing physiology is no accommodation to your designs; which are not to teach men to cast endlessly about nature and form.
-Glasse.'s Sceips.

The organization of the body, with accommodations to its functions, is fitted with the most curious mechanisms.

4. Composition of a difference, reconciliation, adjustment.

ACCOMPANIER. n.s. [from accompany.] The person, that makes part of the company; companion.

Dict.

To ACCOMPANY. v. a. [accompagnier, Fr.] To be with another, as a companion. It is used both of persons and things.
Go visit her, in her chaste bowser of rest,
Accom'pny'd with angel-like delights.
-Spencer, Sonnet iii.

The great business of the senses being to make us take notice of what hurts or advantages the body, it is wisely ordered by nature, that pain should accompany the reception of several ideas.
-Leake.

As fally is usually accompanied with perseverance,
so it is here.
-Swift's Short Virgil, Ireland.

To ACCOMPANY. v. n. To associate with; to become a companion to.
No man in effect doth accompany with others, but by acquiescence, he is aware he is present;
voice, or fashion; with.
-Hill.

ACOMPPLICER. n.s. [complic, Fr. from complex, a word in the barbarous Latin, much in use.]
1. An associate, a partner; usually in an ill sense.

There were several scandalous reports, industriously by Wood and his acco.'s, to discourage all opposition against his infamous project.
-Swift.

2. A partner, or co-operator; in a sense indifferent.

If a tongue would be talking, without a mouth; what could it have done, when it had all its organs of speech, and accompaniments of sound about it?
-Addison, Spectator, No. 247.

3. It is used with the particle of, before a thing; and with, before a person.
Childless Arturus, vastly rich before,
Thus by his losses multiplies his store;
For accompanied to the Vows, which
That burnt his palace, but to build it higher.
-Dryden.

Who, should they steal for want of his relief,
He judged him accompany with the thief.
-Dryden's Fables

To ACCOMPLISH. v. a. [accomplish, Fr. accomplir, L. accomplire.]
1. To complete, to execute fully; as, to accomplish a design.

He that is far off, shall die of the pestilence: and he that is near, shall fall by the sword; and he, that remaineth, and is besieged, shall be by the famine. Thus will I accomplish my fury upon them. Ezekiel, vi. 12.

2. To complete a period of time.
He would accomplish seventy years in the desolation of Jerusalem. Daniel, ix. 5.

3. To fulfil; as, a prophecy.

The vision, which I made known to Lucius the ear of the stroke of this year, 1593, against old books, was common, or in danger, or lost.

4. To gain, to obtain.

Tell him from me (as he will win my love) that he need not fear the hoping.

5. To adorn, or furnish, either mind or body.

From the tents, the armourers accomplishing the knights, with busy hammers closing rivets up, give dreadful note of preparation.

ACCOMPLISHED. particip., adj.
1. Complete, in some qualification.
For, who expects, that under a tutor a young gentleman should be accomplished publick orator or logician.

2. Elegant; finished, in respect of embellishments; used commonly of acquired qualifications, without including moral excellence.
The next I took to wife, (O, that I never had! fond wish too late) was in this respect, his wife, the most excellent; that spurious monster, my accomplished snare.

ACCOMPLISHER. n. s. [from accomplish.]
The person that accomplishes. Dic.

ACCOMPLISHMENT. n. s. [accomplissement, Fr.]
This would be the accomplishment of their common felicity; in case, by their evil, either through destiny or advice, they suffered not the occasion to be lost.

Sir John Hayward.

Thereby he might evade the accomplishment of those affections he now but gradually endured.

Nature's Vulg. Errors.

He thought it impossible to find in any one body, all those perfections, which he sought for the accomplishment of a Helen; because nature, in any individual person, makes nothing that is perfect in all its parts.

Dryden's Dunciad, Pref.

2. Completion; as, of a prophecy.
The intrinsic success of the apostles' preaching, and the completion of unity of their predictions, which to those early Christians were matters of faith only, are to its matters of sight and experience.

Atterbury's Sermons.

3. Embellishment, elegance, ornament of mind or body.
Young heirs and elder brothers, from their own reflecting upon the estates they are born to, and therefore thinking all other accomplishments unnecessary, are of no manner of use, but to keep up their families.

Addison, Spectator, No. 172.

ACC.

4. The act of obtaining or perfecting anything; attainment; completion.
The means suggested by policy and worldly wisdom, for the attainment of those excellently efficacious, are unfit for that purpose; not only upon the account of the insufficiency of them; but also of their frequent opposition and contrariety to the accomplishment of such ends.

South's Sermon.

ACCOMPT. n. s. [Fr. compter, and comp, anciently acoper, Skirnir.]
An account; reckoning. See ACCOUNT.

The soul may have time, to call itself to a just account of all things past; by means whereof repentance is perfected.

Hosmer, b. v. § 40.

Each of my old acquaintances, when I was in the seventy and tenth years of my age, and had wound their round the year. Prior.

ACCOMPTANT. n. s. [accountant, Fr.]
A reckoner, computer. See ACCOUNTANT.

As the comptant runs on, generally the comptant goes backward.

South's Sermons.

ACCOUNTING DAY. The day on which the reckoning is to be settled.
To whom thou dost owe, thou must pay:
Think on the debt against thee accounting day.

Sir J. Denham.

To ACCORD. v. a. [derived by some from corda, the string of a musical instrument; by others from corda, hearts: in the first, implying harmony; in the other unanimity.]
1. To make; agree to; adjust one thing to another; with the particle to.
The first sports, the shepherds showed, were full of such beauty and gaiety; as, being accorded to the pipe which they bore in their mouths, even as they danced, made a right picture of their chief god Pan, and his companions the satyrs. Suda, b. k.

Her hands accorded the lute's music to the voice; her panting heart danced to the music.

Sedd. b. ii.

The lights and shades, whose well accorded strife
Gives all the strength and colour of our life.

Pope's Epist. Hymn.

2. To bring to agreement; to compose; to accommodate.
Men would not rest upon bare contracts, without reducing the debt into a speculation; which made much certainty, and accorded many suits.

M. Hume.

To ACCORD. v. n. To agree, to suit one another; with the particle with.
Things are often spoke, and seldom meant.
But (that my heart accordeth with my tongue,
Seeing the deed is meritorious,
And to preserve my sovereign from his foe)
Say but the word, and I will be his priest.

Shakespeare, Henry VI.

Several of the main parts of Moses's history, as concerning the flood, and the first fathers of the several nations of the world, do very well accord with the most ancient accounts of profane history.

Dryden's History of the world.

Jarring interests of themselves create
Th' according music of a well-mixt state.

Pope.

ACCORD. n. s. [from accord.]
1. Agreement with a person; with the particle with.
And prays he may in long accordance bide,
With that great worth, which hath such wonders wrought.

Fairfax, b. ii. stanza 63.

2. Conformity to something.
The only way of defining sin is, by the contrariety to the will of God; as of good, by the accordance with that will.

Hammond's Fundamentals.

ACCORDANT. adj. [accordant, Fr.] Wilting; in a good humour.
Not in use.

The prince discovered that he loved your nice; and as he had a knowledge of the matter, in a dance; and could not find him, accordant, he meant to take the present time by the top, and instantly break with you of it.

Shakespeare. Much ado about Nothing.

ACCORDING. prep. [from accord, of which it is properly a participle, and is therefore never used but with to.]
1. In a manner suitable to, agreeably to, in proportion.
Our churches are places provided, that the people might there assemble themselves in due and decent manner, according to their several degrees and orders.

Hosmer, b. v. § 13.

Our zeal then should be according to knowledge; and what kind of knowledge? Without all question, first, according to the true, saving, evangelical knowledge. It should accord to the gospel, the whole gospel: not only according to its truths, but precepts; not only according to its free grace, but necessary duties; not only according to its mysteries, but also it commandments.

Sprat's Sermons.

Noble is the name that is built on canopied and imperious, according to these heavenly lines of Sir John Denham.

Addison, Spectator.

2. With regard to.
God made all things in number, weight, and measure; and gave them to be considered by us according to these properties, which are inherent in created beings.

Hosmer on time.

3. In proportion. The following phrase is, I think, vitious.

Spenser's Fairy Queen.

18
A man may, with prudence and a good conscience, approve of the professed principles of one party more than of the other, according as he thinks they best promote the good of church and state.

Suff’s Church of England Man.

ACCORDINGLY, a d. [from accord.]

Agreeably, suitably, conformably.

As the actions of men are of sundry distinct kinds, so to those laws thereof must accordingly be distinguished.

Hock, b. v.

Sirs, thou saidst to have a stubborn soul,

That apprehends no further guidance than this world,

And squarst thy life accordingly.

Shakespeare’s Measure for Measure.

Wherever is ascribed to the authority and sense of scripture, as to believe the doctrine of it, and to live accordingly, shall be saved. Titus. Preface.

Philom., p. 8.

It must be always remembered; that nothing can come into the account of recreation, that is not done with delight.

Locke on Education, § 137.

In matters, where his judgment led him to oppose men on a public account, he would do it vigorously and heartily.

Atterbury’s Sermon.

The assertion is our Saviour’s, thus uttered by him in the person of Abraham, the father of the faithful, also, on an account of that scripture, very finely introduced.

Atterbury’s Sermons.

These tribunes kindled great dissensions between the nobles and the commons, on the account of Coriolanus, a nobleman, whom the latter had imprisoned.

Suff’s Contests in Athens and Rome.

Nothing can recommend itself to our love, or our esteem, but either as it denotes our present, or is a means to assure a future happiness.

Roger’s Sermon v.

Sempontus gives no thanks on this account.

Addison’s Cato.

8. A narrative; relation; in this use it may seem to be derived from conte, Fr. a tale, a narration.

The review or examination of an affair taken by authority; as, the magistrate took an account of the tumult.

Shakespeare’s Macbeth.

The true ground of morality can only be the will and law of a God, who sees men in the dark, has in his hands rewards and punishments, and is power enough to call the account the proudest offender.

Loche.

11. Explanation; assignment of causes.

It is easy to give account how it comes to pass, that though all men desire happiness, yet they will carry them so contrarily.

Loche.

It being, in our author’s account, a right acquired by begetting, to rule over those he had begotten, it was not a power revocable; for he is enabled,

by the right, being consequent to, and built on an act perfectly personal, made that power so and impossible to be inherited.

Loche.

12. An opinion previously established.

These were designed to join with the forces at sea;

there being prepared a number of that-bottomed to boats, to transport the land forces under the wing of the sea navy: for it is no account, but that the navy should be absolutely master of the seas.

Bacon’s Considerations on War with Spain.

A prodigious young fellow, that had sold his clothes;

upon the sight of a swallowed name account, that summer was at hand, and away went his shirt away.

Entw., Feb. 293.

13. The reasons of any thing collected.

Being convinced, upon all accounts, that they had the same reason to believe the history of our

Saviour; as that of any other person, to which they themselves were more actually eye-witnesses;

they were bound, by all the rules of historical faith and of right reason, to give credit to this history.

Add.

Account is, in the common law, taken for a writ or action, brought against a man; that, by means of office or business undertaken, is to render an account to another person, as a bailiff toward his master, a guardian to his ward.

Concill.

To ACCOUNT. n. a. [See ACCOUNT.]

1. To esteem, to think, to hold in opinion.

That also was accounted a land of giants. Deut.

2. To reckon, to value.

Neither the motion of the moon, whereby months are computed, nor the sun, whereby years are accounted, consists of whole numbers.

Heron’s Plerarum Errors.

3. To assign to, as a debt; with the particle to.

For some years really accrued the yearly sum of two hundred thousand pounds to the king’s coffers; and it was, in truth, the only project, that was accounted to his own service.

Clarendon.

4. To hold in esteem; with of.

Silver was nothing accounted of, in the days of Solomon. Chron.

To ACCOUNT, n. a.

1. To reckon.

The calendar months are likewise arbitrarily and unequally settled, by the same power; by which we have, in this day, account; and the measure and make up that which we call the Julian year.

Holden on Time.

2. To give an account, to assign the causes; in which sense it is followed by the particle for.

If any one should ask, why our general continued so easy to the last? I know no other way to account for it, but by that unmeasurable love of wealth, which his best friends allow to be his predominant passion.

3. To make up the reckoning; to answer; with for.

Then thou shalt see him pludg’d, when least he fears;

At once accounting for his deep errors.

Dr担任’s Juv. Sat. xiii.

They had no uneasy presages of a future reckoning, but the profit thereby, must be accounted for; and may perhaps be outweighed by the pains which shall then fly hold of them.

Atterbury’s Sermon.

4. To appear as the medium by which any thing may be explained.

Such, as have a faulty circulation through the lungs, ought to eat very little at a time; because the increase of the quantity of fresh chyle must make that circulation still more uneasy; which, indeed, is the case of consumptive and some asthmatie persons; and accounts for the symptoms they are troubled with after eating. Arbain, on Meninges

ACCOUNTABLE, a d. [from account.]

Of whom an account may be required; who must answer for: followed by the particle to, before the person; and for, before the thing.

Addendum

ACCOUNTABLE to none.

But to my counsel’s, and my God alone, Oldham.

Thinking themselves excused from standing upon their own legs, or being accountable for their conduct, when we seldom try ourselves with enquiries.

Loche on Education.

The good magistrate will make no distinction:

for the judgment is God’s; and he will look upon himself as accountable at his bar for the equity of it.

Atterbury’s Sermons.

When by glaciation, wood, straw, dust, and water, are supposed to be united into one lump, the cold does not cause any real union or aduation; but, only hardening the aqueous parts of the earth, and the other bodies, being accidentally present in that liquor, are frozen up in it, but not really united. Bp.

ADUANCY. n.s. [advenitas, Lat.] Crookedness; flexure inwards; hooked.

There can be no question, but the aduancy of the puppies and beaks of the hawks, is the cause of the great and habitual humbleness of those animals. Aduance and Vexation, Sept.

ADUQUE. adj. [aduenus, Lat.] Crooked; bending inwards; hooked.

The birds, that are speakers, are parrots, pies, Jays, daws, and ravens; of which, parrots have an aduquum bill, but the rest not. Bacon's Nat. Hist. No. 239.

ADVOCATION. n.s. [from advocate.] The act of pleading; vindication; defence; apology; a word in little use.

If any there are, who are of opinion, that there are no antipodes, or that the stars do fall; they shall not want herein the appliance or advocation of Satan. Broun's Wonders, b. 1.

ADVOCATE. n.s. [advocatus, Lat.] 1. He that pleads the cause of another, in a court of judicature.

An advocate (a very eminent import of the word) is that person, who has the pleading and management of a judicial cause. In a strict way of speaking, an advocate is not a pleading advocate, who is in the passion of the cause; and is often, in Latin, termed togatus, and in English, a person of the long robe. Bp. Adovitus, Deputto, and Yagers Hour.

Learn what thou ow'st thy country and thy friend; what's requisite to spare, and what to spend: Learn this; and, after, envy not the store. Of the great'st advocate, that grinds the poor. Dryden, Persian.

2. He, that pleads any cause, in whatever manner a cause, as a controversialist or vindicator. If she dare trust me with her little babe, I'll shew the King; and undertake to make her advocate to the lowest. Shakespeare.

Of the several forms of government, that have been or are in the world; that cause seems commonly the better, that has the better advocate, or is advantaged by fischer experience. Temple, Idylls.

3. It is used with the particle for, before the person or thing, in whose favour the plea is offered. Goes to all living worth, except your own; And advocates, for folly dead and gone.

4. In the scriptural and sacred sense, it stands for one of the offices of our Redeemer.

AER.

AER. n.s. See Addice.

Al, or Ae. A diphthong, of very frequent use in the Latin language; which seems not, properly to have any place in the English; since the $c$ of the Saxons has been long out of use, being changed to $c$ simple; to which, in words frequently occurring, the $e$ of the Romans is (in the same manner) altered; as in equa$, equa\textsuperscript{r}, equa$, etc., the Romans.

ELOGUE. n.s. [written instead of Eclogue, from a mistaken etymology.] A pastoral; a dialogue in verse, between goat-herds.

Which moved him rather, in eclogues otherwise to write; doubting perhaps his ability, which he little needed, or minding to furnish our tongue with this kind, where it faulted. Sprauer's Past.

EGLIOPS. n.s. [a'glws, Gr. signifying goat-eyed, the goat being subject to this ailment.] A tumour or swelling in the outer corner of the eye, by the root of the nose, either with or without an inflammation: also a plant so called, for its supposed virtues against such a distemper. Quincy.

For daring to affy a mighty lord,
Unto the daughter of a worthless king.

Shaksper. Henry VI.

AFFIELD, adv. [from a and field. See FIELD.] To the field.

We drove affield; and both together heard,
What time the grey fly winds her sultry horn;
Battling our blocks, with the fresh dew of night.

Milton.

AFFLE. adj. [from a and float. See
FLOAT.] Level with the ground.

When you would have many new roots of fruit trees, take a low tree; and bow it, and lay all his branches afflat upon the ground, and cast earth on them; and every twig will take root.

Bacon's Nat. History.

AFOAT. adj. [from a and float. See FLOAT.] Borne up in the water; not sinking; in figurative sense, within its original motion.

There is a tide, in the affairs of men;
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallow waters;
On such a full sea, are we now afloat;
And we must take the current when it serves,
Or lose our ventures.

Shaksper. Julius Cæsar.

AFO. Take any passage of the soul of man, while it is predominant and afoot; and, just in the critical height of it, nick it with some lucky or unlucky word; and you may as certainly over-rule to your purpose, as a spark of fire, falling upon gunpowder, will inflamibly blow it up.

Smollett.

Thee generally several hundred loads of niter afloat: for they cut, above twenty-five leagures up the river; and other rivers bring in their contributions.

Adams's Diary.

AFOOT, a. [from a and foot.] 1. On foot; not on horseback.

He thought it best, to return, for that day, to a village not far off; and, dispatching his horse in some sort, the next day early, to come afoot thither.

hand.] 1. By a previous provision.

Many of the particular subjects of discourse are occasional, and such as cannot afoothand be referred to any certain account.

2. Provided; prepared; previously fitted.

For it will be said, that in the former times whereof we have spoken, Spain was so mighty as now it is; and England, on the other afoot was more afoothand in all matters of power.

Bacon's Considerations on War with Spain

AFOREMENTIONED. adj. [from afoot and mentioned.] Mentioned before.

Among the nine other parts, five are not in a condition to give alms or relief to those afootmen tioned: being very near reduced themselves, to the same miserable condition.

Adams.

AFORENAMED. adj. [from afoot and named.] Named before.

Imitate something of circular form; in which, as in all other afootnamed proportions, you shall help yourself by the diameter.

Poe's Dying.

AFORESAID. adj. [from afoot and said.

It need not go for repetition, if we resume again that, which we said in the afootmentioned experiment.

AGA

This mode of speaking probably had its original from the idea of making provision against, or in opposition to, a time of misfortune; but by degrees acquired a neutral sense. It sometimes has the case elliptically suppressed; as, against the time, when he comes. The like charge was given them against the time, they should come to settle themselves in the land promised unto their fathers.

In that, and the whole covered over, with a friable cretaceous sand, from the base of a larch forest.

AGATY. adj. [from agate.] Partaking of the nature of agate.

An agaty flint was above two inches in diameter; the whole covered over, with a friable cretaceous sand, from the base of a larch forest.

AGAZI. r. a. To set a gazing: as, amaze, amuse, and others. To strike with amazement; to stupey with sudden terror. The verb is now out of use.

As so as they travelled, so they came easy.

An armed knight toward them gallop fast.

That seemed from some feared to fly.

Or other grisy thing that him agaze.

Fairy Queen.

AGAZED. participial adj. [from agaze; which see.] Struck with amazement; terrified to stupidity.

Hundreds be sent to hell; and none durst stand him.

Here, there, and every where, every'ud be fleer:

The French exclain'd. 'The devil was in arms!'

All the whole army stood agaze on him.

Shakep. Henry VI.

AGE. n. s. [age, Fr. ancienneté, or age: it is deduced by Manege, from etatium, of statia, by Janius, from a, which (in the t'etonic dialects) signified long duration.

1. Any period of time, attributed to something, as the whole or part of its duration: in this sense, we say, the age of man, the several ages of the world, the golden or iron age.

One mon age was many parts, his life being seven ages.

Shakep.

And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt, seventeen years; so the whole age of Jacob was an hundred forty and seven years.

Genes. xlix. 25.

2. A succession or generation of men.

Hence lastly springs care of posterities; for things, their kind would everlastings make: Hence is it, that old men do plant young trees, the fruit whereof another age shall take, Sir J. Davies.

Next to the Son,

Destin'Restorer of mankind, by whom New heav'n and earth shall to the age reive, Or down from heav'n descend, Milton's Par. Lost.

1. No declining age.

E'er felt the raptures of poetic rage.

Roncesvall.

3. The time, in which any particular man, or race of men lived, or shall live; as, the age of heroes.

No longer now the golden age appears, When patriarchs wits survived a thousand years.

Dryden.

4. The space of a hundred years; a secular period; a century.

5. The latter part of life; old age; oldness.

You see, how full of change his age is; the observation we have made of it, hath not been little: he always loved our sister must; and, with what poor judgment, he hath now cast her off!

Shakep. King Lear.

Boys must not have th' ambitious care of men; nor, the weak anxiety of age.

Roncesvall.

And on this fair feast, when all is said, the loves delighted, and the graces play'd:

Insulting age will trace his cruel way, and leave sad marks of his destructive sway.

Priest.

6. Maturity; ripeness; years of discretion; full strength of life.

A solemn admission of proverbes; all, that either, being of age, desire that admission for themselves; or that, in infancy, are by others presented to that charity of the church.

Hammon.

We sought our sires, not with their own content.

Had (ere we came to age) our portion spent.

Dryden.

7. In law.

In a man, the age of fourteen years is the age of discretion; and twenty-one years is the full age.

In a woman, at seven years of age, the lord her father may distrain for aid to marry her at the age of nine years, she is dowerable; at twelve years, she is able finally to ratify and confirm her former acts, given to mankind; at fourteen, she is enabled, to receive her land into her own hands; and shall be out of ward, at the death of her parents. Before, at fifteen, she shall be out of ward; though, at the death of her ancestor, she was within the age of fourteen years; at twenty-one, she is able to alienate her lands and tenements. At the age of fourteen, a spirit-less is enabled to choose his own guardian; at the age of fourteen, a man may consent to marriage.

Cowell.

AGED. adj. [from age. It makes two syllables in poetry.

1. Old; stricken in years; applied generally, to animate beings.

If the comparison do stand between man and man, the aged (for the most part) are best experienced, least subject to rash and unadvised passions.

Hudson.

Novelty is only in request: and it is as dangerous, to be aged, as any kind of course; as it is virtuous, to be constant in any undertaking.

Shakep. Measure for Measure.

Kindness itself to old men; and charity will prove, To raise the feeble fires of aged love.

Prior.

2. Old; applied to inanimate things.

This use is rare, and commonly with some tendency to the prosopopoeia.

The people did not more worship the images of gold and silver, than their statutes; and the same, Quintilian saith, of the aged oaks.

Stilligast's Defence of the, in Rom. Idiot.

AGEDLY. adv. [from aged.] After the manner of an aged person.

AGE'N. adv. [agen, Sax.]

Again; in return. See AGAIN.

This word is now only written in this manner (though it be in reality the true orthography) for the sake of rhyme.

Thus Venus: Thus her son reply'd ages.

None of your sisters have we heard or seen.

Dryden.

AGENCY. r. s. [from agent.]

1. The quality of acting; the state of being in action; action.

A few advances there are in the following papers, tending to assert the superintendence and agency of Providence in the natural world.

Hudson's Preface to Nat. Hist.

2. The office of an agent or factor for another; business performed by an agent.

Some of the purchasers themselves may be content to live cheap in a wealthy country, rather than to encounter the charge of exchange and assignments.

Swift.

AGENT. adj. [agens, Lat.] That which acts; opposed to patient, or that which is acted upon.

This success is ofl' truly ascribed, unto the force of imagination in the body agent; and, then, by a secondary means, it may upon a diverse body; as, for example; if a man carry a ring; or some part of a beast, believing truly that it will help him to obtain his love; it may make him more industrious, and again more confident and persisting, than otherwise he would be. Bacon's Nat. Hist.

AGENT. n. s.

1. An actor; he, that acts; he, that possesses the faculty of action.
AGG

Where there is no doubt, deliberation is not excluded, an impression unto the thing; but as needless in regard of the agent, which weal already what to resolve upon.

To whom, nor agent, nor the instrument,
Nor power of working from the work is known.

He's made to parts, free to good or ill,
And forc'd it not, he foresees the will.
Freedom was first bestowed on human race,
And prescience only held the second place.

Drum.

A miracle is, exceeding the power of any created agent, consequently being an effect of the divine omnipotence.

South's Sermons.

2. A substitute; a deputy; a factor; a person, employed to transact the business of another.

- All hearts in love, use your own tongues;

Let every eye negotiate for itself,

And trust to no agent.

Shakery.

They had not the wit, to send to them (in any orderly fashion) agents or chosen men, to tempt them, and to treat with them. Bacon's Henry VII.

Remember, Sir, your fury of a wife:

Who, not content to be reveng'd on you,

The agent of your passion will pursue. Dry. Aureng.

3. That, which has the power of operating, or producing effects, upon another thing.

They produced wonderful effects, by the proper application of agents to patients. Temple.

AGGATION. n.s. [Lat. gchen.] Concretion of ice.

It is round in ball, and figured in its gluttonous descent from heaven; growing greater or lesser, according to the accretion or obfuscation about the fundamental atoms thereof.

Brown's Tulgar Errours.

To A'GGERATE. v.a. [from agger, Lat.]

To heap up.

AGGERATION. n.s. [aggr.]

Full of heaps.

AGGLOMERANTS. n.s. [from agglomerat-.

Those medicines or applications, which have the power of uniting parts together.

To AGGLUTINATE. v.a. [from ad and glut, glue, Lat.]

To unite one part to another; to join together, so as not to fall asunder.

It is a word, almost appropriated to medicine.

The body has got room enough, to grow into its full dimensions; which is performed, by the daily ingestion of bread, that is digested into blood; which, being diffused through the body, is agglutinated to those parts, that were immediately agglutinated to the foundation bones.

Harvey on Consumptions.

AGGLUTINATION. n.s. [from aggluti-

Union; cohesion; the act of agglutinating; the state of being agglutinated.

The occasion of its not healing by agglutination,
2. To impose some hardships upon; to harass; to hurt in one's right. This is a kind of juridical sense; and whenever it is used now, it seems to bear some allusion to forms of law.

Sewall, archbishop of York, much agitted with some practices of the pope's collectors, took all legal advantage of it.
The landed man finds himself aggrieved, by the falling of his rents, and the strengthening of his security; whilst the manifold man keeps up his gains, and the mercantile thrives and grows rich by trade.

Of injury's fame, and mighty wrongs receiv'd,
Chloe complaints, and wondrously aggrieved.
Granville.

To AGGREGATE v. a. [aggregate, Lat.]
To bring together into one figure; to crowd together; a term of printing.

Bodies of divers nature, which are agglomerated (or combined) together, are agreeable and pleasant to the sight.

Dygenia.

AGHAIST. [either participial of agaze (see AGAIZE), and then to be written agazed, or agast; or from a and gay, a ghost; which the present orthography favours; perhaps they were originally different words.]

Struck with horror, as at the sight of a spectre; stupefied with terror.

It is generally applied to the external appearance.

She (sighing sore, as if her heart in twain
Had risen been, and all her heart-strings burst)
With weary drooping eye look'd up, like one agast.

Spenser.
The aged earth, agast.

With terror of that blast,
Shall from the source to the centre shake.

Milton.

Aghast he wak'd; and, starting from his bed,
Cold sweat in clammy drops his limbs o'erspread.

Dygenia's Emile.

I laugh to think, how your unshaken Cato
Will look agast, while unforeseen destruction
Pours in upon him thus from ev'ry side.

Adda, Cato.

AGILE adj. [agile, Fr. agilis, Lat.]
Nimbly; ready; having the quality of being speedily put in motion; active.

With that he gave his able horse the head;
And, bending forward, struck his agile heels Against the pinding sides of his poor jade.

Up to the howel.

Shakespeare, Henry IV.

The immediate and agile subserviency of the spirits to the empire of the mind or soul.

Latter part.

To guide its actions with informing care,
In peace to judge, to conquer in the war.

Ridder it agile, witty, valiant, age;
As fits the various course of human age.

Prior.

AGILITY n. s. [from agile].
The quality of being agile; nimbleness; readiness for motion; quickness; activity.

AGILNESS n. s. [from agile].
The quality of being agile; nimbleness; readiness for motion; quickness; activity.

AGILLOCHM. n. s. Aloeoswood.
A tree in the East-Indies, brought to us in small bits, of a very fragrant scent. It is hot, drying, and accounted a strengthener of the nerves in general: the best is of a blackish purple colour; and so light, as to swim upon water.

Quincy.

AGO n. s. [An Italian word, signifying ease or convenience.]
A mercantile term, used chiefly in Holland and Venice, for the difference between the value of bank notes, and the current money. Chambers.

To AGOST. r. a. [from giste, Fr. a bed or resting place, or from gister, i. e. stani.]

To take in and feed the cattle of strangers in the king's forest, and to gather the wood of his forest, for what he do this, are called agosters; in English, guest or gist takers: their function is termed agistment; as, agistment upon the sea-banks.

This word agist is also used, for the taking-in of other men's cattle into any man's ground, at a certain rate per week.

Blount.

AGISTMENT n. s. [See AGIST.

This is taken by the canons lawyers, in another sense, than it is mentioned under agist.

They seem to intend by it, a modus or composition, or mean rate, at which some right or due may be reckoned; perhaps it is corrupted from advancement, or adjustment.

AGISTOR n. s. [from agist.] An officer of the king's forest. See AGIST.

And, of catching hold, him strongly staid From drowning. Fairy Queen.

Neither shall they give any thing without them, that makes upon them, or aid them with victuals, weapons, money, or ships.

By the loud trumpet, which our courage aid'd, We learn that, sound as well as sense persuade.

Racoonom.

AID. n. s. [from To aid.]

1. Help; support.

The memory of useful things may receive considerable aid, if they are thrown into verse.

Watts's Improvement of the Mind.

Your patrimonial stores in peace possess;

Undoubled all your frail claim confess;

Your private right should impugn power invade.

The peers of Uthara would aim in aid. *Pope's Od.

2. The person that gives help or support; a helper; auxiliary.

Thou hast said, it is not good, that man should be alone; let us make unto him an aid, like unto himself. Gen. vii.

Great aids came in to him, partly upon missiles, and partly voluntary from many parts. Bacon's Henry VII.

3. In law.

Aid is also peculiarly used, in matter of pleading, for a petition made in court, for the calling in of help from another; that hath an interest in the cause in question; and is likewise, both to give strength to the party, that prays in aid of him; and also, to avoid a prejudice arising towards his own right, except it be prevented: as, when a tenant for term of life, courtesy, &c. being impeached touching his estate, he may pray in aid of him in the reversion; that is, in the court, that he may be called in by writ, to allege what he thinks good for the maintenance both of his right and his claim.

*Adam's *n. s. [from aid.] Help; support: a word little used.

Oft have I seen a thinly parted ghost,

Of shay semblance, meagre, pale, and bloodless, Being all devoured by the hallowing heart; Who, in the conflict that it holds with death, Attracts the same, for aid against the enemy.

Shaken. Henry.

AIDLESS. adj. [from aid and less, an inseparable particle] Helpless; unsupported; undefended.

Alone he enter'd

The mortal gate to the city, which he painted

With shunless destiny: aidless came off; And with a sudden re-enforcement, struck Corioli, like a planet: Shaken. Coriolanus.

He had none.

Already, ere my best speed could prevent,

The aidless innocent lady, his wife, torey.

Milton's Comus.

AIGUET. n. s. [aiguet, Fr.] A point, with tags; points of gold, at the end of fringes.

It all above besprinkled was throughout

With golden aiglettes, that cliter'd bright,

Like twinkling stars; and, all the skirt about,

Was benn'd with golden fringes. Fairy Queen.

To All. r. a. [elegant, Sax. to be troublesome.]

1. To pain; to trouble; to give pain.

And the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her; What aileth thee? Hagar? fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad, where he is. Gen. vii.

2. It is used in a sense less determinate

For to afflic in any manner; as, something aills me, that I cannot sit still; what ails the man, that he laughs without reason?

Love smiled, and thus said; Want, joined to desire, is unhappy; but, if the noughtness of what can Heruculus aills; Shaks.

What ails me, that I cannot lose thy thought? Command, the empress lister to be brought:

In her death, shall some diversion find

And rid my thoughts at once, of woman-kind. Dryden's Tigranique Lec.

3. To feel pain; to be incommoded.

It is, that remarkable, this word is never used, but with some indefinite term, or the word nothing; as, What ails him? What does he ail? He ails something; he ails nothing. Something ails him; nothing ails him. Thus we never say, a fever ails him, or he ails a fever; or use definite terms with this verb.

AIL. n. s. [from the verb.] A disease.

Or heal, O Norses, thy obscurer all. Pope.

AILMENT. n. s. [from ail.] Pain, disease.

Little ailments oft attend the fair,

Not decent for a husband's eye or ear. Granville.

I am never ill, but I think of your ailments: and repine, that they mutually hinder our being together. Swift's Letters.

AILING. participial adj. [from To ail.] Sickly; full of complaints.

To AIM. r. a. [It is derived by skimmer from osmer, to point at; a word which I have not found.]

1. To endeavour to strike with a missive weapon; to direct towards: with the particle at.

Ails thee then at princes, all amsaid they said, The last of games. Pope's Odyssey.

2. To point the view, or direct the steps, towards any thing; to tend towards; to endeavour to reach or obtain; with to formerly, now only with at.

Let him make the world lie bare; so here the end.

To which all men do aim, rich to be made.

Such grace now, to be happy, is before thee laid. Fairy Queen.

AIR

Air was all which we desired for itself, as health, as long and quiet knowledge; nevertheless they are not the last mark, whereby we aim; but have their further end, whereunto they are referred.

Shaks.

So with an aplausible, and aiming still at more, He now provokes the sea-gods from the shore.

Dryden. Aeneas.

Religion tends, to the case and pleasure, the peace and tranquility, of our minds; which, all the wisdom of the world did always aim at, as the utmost felicity of this life. Tilts.

To guess.

To AIM. r. a. To direct a missile weapon; more particularly taken, for the act of pointing the weapon with the eye, before its dismission from the hand.

And proud Idas, Peirans character,

Who shakes his empty reins, and airs his airy spear. Dryden.

AIM. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The direction of a missile weapon.

A circular, young and eager of his game,

Soon bent his bow, uncertain of his aim.

But the dire found the fatal arrow glides,

Which, piercing his bosom, ran its way into his panting sides.

Dryden. En. vii.

2. The point, to which the thing thrown is directed.

That arrows fled not swifter toward their aim; Than did our soldiers, aiming at their safety.

3. In a figurative sense, a purpose; a scheme; an intention; a design.

He trusted to have equal'd the Most High,

If he oppos'd me, and, with ambitious aim,

Against the throne and monarchy of God,

Rall'd impious war. Milton's Par. Lost. h. l. 41.

But see, how oft ambitious aims are crouch; And chiefs contend, till all the prize is lost. Pope.

4. The object of a design; the thing, after which any one endeavours.

The safest way is to suppose, that the epistle has but one aim; till (by a frequent perusal of it) you are forced to see, there are distinct independent parts.

Locke's Essay on St. Paul's Epistles.

5. Conjecture; guess.

It is impossible, by aim to tell it; and for experience and knowledge thereof, I do not think that, there was ever any of the particulars thereof.

Spenser on Ireland.

There is a history in all men's lives, Pitting the nature of the world against the thing observed, a man may prophesy

With a near aim, of the main chance of things; As yet not come to life, which, in their seeds

And weak beginnings, are incresed.

Shaks. Henry IV.

AIR. n. s. [air, Fr. aér, L.:]

1. The element, encompassing the terraqueous globe.

If I were to tell, what I mean by the word air; I mean, it is that fine fluid, which, being breath'd in and breathe out continually; or it is that thin fluid body, in which the birds fly, a little above the earth; or it is that invisible moisture, which fills all places near the earth, or which immediately encompasses the globe of earth and water.

Watts's Logic.

2. The state of the air; or the air, considered with regard to health.

There be many good and healthful airs, that do appear by habituation and other proofs; that differ not in smell from other airs.

Bacon's Natural History. h. 904.

3. Air in motion; a small gentle wind.

Fresh gales and gentle airs

Whisper'd it to the woods: and from their wings

Plying rose, thing; from the spicy shrub

Dispelling! Milt.'s Par. Lost. h. vii. 154.
AIR

But safe repose, without an air of breath,
Dwells here; and a dumb quiet, next to death.
Let warm airs through trembling otiers play,
And Albion’s cliffs resound the rural lay.

4. Scent; vapour.
Stinks, which the nostrils strictly abhor,
Are not the most puerile; but such airs, as have
Some similitude with the man’s body; and so unite Themselves, and betry the spirit. Bacon.

5. Blast; pestilential vapour.
All the storg’d vengeances of heaven fall
On the ingrateful top; to strike her young bone;
You taking air, with lameness.

Shakesp. King Lear.

6. Any thing, light or uncertain; that is
As light, as air.
O momentous grace of mortal men!
Which we must hunt after, for the grace of God,
Who builds his hope in air of your fair looks,
Lives like a drunken sailor on a mast.
Ready with ev’ry nod to tumble down.

Shakesp. Richard III.

7. The open weather; air unconfined.
The garden was bless’d! within the sphere,
Where young Emilia took the morning air.

Dryden’s Fable.

8. Vent; utterance; emission into the air.
I would have asked you, if I durst for shame.
If I could breathe, I gave it air before me.
But air, why were we not both of a sex?
For then we might have lived, without a crime.

Dryden.

9. Publication; exposure to the public view and knowledge.
I am sorry to find, it has taken air, that I have some hand in these papers.

Pope’s Letters.

It grew from the air, which the princes and states abroad received from their ambassadors and agents here.

Paradise Regained.

11. Mistick, whether light or serious;
sound; air modulated.
This mistick crept by me upon the waters,
Attaining both their fury and my passion.
With its sweet air.

Call in some mistick, I have heard, soft airs
Can charm our senses, and expel our cares.

Shakespeare’s Sonnets.

12. The same, which some entertain with most delightful transports, to others are important.

Glencoe’s Scenes Scientific.

Since we have such a treasure of words, so proper for the airs of musick; I wonder that;
persons should give so little attention.

Addison, Spectator, No. 463.

13. Air, the manner, or manner of a person;
the look.
Her graceful innocence, her ev’ry air,
Of gesture, or least action, of her mien.

Milton’s Paradise Lost.

For the air of youth
Hopeful and cheerful, in thy blood shall reign
A beauty dapp’d of cold and dry.
To weigh thy spirits down, and consume
The balm of life.

Milton’s Paradise Lost.

But, having the life before us, besides the experience of all they knew; it is no wonder, to hit some airs and features which they have missed.

Dryden on Dramatic Poetry.

There is something wonderfully divine in
This picture of nature.

Addison on Italy.

Yet should the Graces all thy figures place,
And breathe an air divinest on thy face.

Pope.

14. An affected manner or gesture;
as, a lofty air, a gay air.
Whom Accurs follows, with a frowning air;
But vain within, and proudly popular.

Shakesp. King Henry VI.

There are of these sorts of beauties, which last but for a moment; as, the different airs of an assembly, upon the sight of an unexpected unconcealed object; some particularity of a violent passion, some graceful action, a smile, a glance of an eye, a disdainful look, a look of gravity, and a thousand other such like things.

Addison’s Remarks on Italy.

To curl their wav’ring hairs,
Assist their blushers, and inspire their airs.
Pope; he assumes and affects an entire set of very different airs: he conceives himself, a being of a superior nature.

Swift.

15. Appearance.
As it was concomitanted with the air of a secret,
it soon found its way into the world.

Pope’s Dep. to Rape of the Lock.

artificial or practised motions of a managed horse.

Chambers.

To A.I.R. r. a. [from the noun air.]

1. To expose to the air; to open to the air.
The other made, a matter of small communication in itself; if they, who wear it, do nothing else, but air the rubes which their place required.

Shakesp. to Sir F. Bacon, b. v. 23.

Fleas breed principally of straw or straw, where there hath been a little moisture; or the chamber and bed-straw being new and not dried.

Bacon’s Natural History, No. 606.

We have had, in our time, experience twice or three times; where, the judges that sat upon the jury, and some of those that attended the business, were present, sickened upon it, and died.
Therefore, it was good wisdom, that in such cases the jury were aired, before they were brought forth.

Bacon’s Nat. Hist. No. 914.

As the ants were airing their provisions one winter, up came a hungry grass-hopper to them, and begs a charity.

L’Estrange’s Fables.

Or wicker-baskets weave, or air the corn.

Dryden’s Fugiel.

2. To gratify, by enjoying the open air, with the natural pronoun.
Now, stay a little.
Were you but riding forth to air yourself;
Such parting were too petty.

Shakesp. Cymbeline.

I ascended, on a scaffold of light, to pass the rest of the day in meditation and prayer. As I was before airing myself, on the tops of the mountains, I fell into a profound contemplation, on the vanity of human life.

Addison.

3. To air liquors; to warm them, by the fire: a term, used in conversation.

Addison Spect.

4. To breed in nests. In this sense, it is derived from aeris, a nest: it is now only used of uninclosed nests.

You may add your busy, dangerous, discourting, yea and sometimes delightful, stedding, one from another, of the eggs and young ones; who if they were put to them, in large numbers and quietly, there would be store sufficient, to kill not only the partridges, but even all the good house-wives chickens, in the country.

Carus’s Survey of Cornwall.

ALG, or ALGEBRA, N. S. [An Arabic word, of uncertain etymology; derived by some, from Geber the philosopher; by some, from gebr, parchment; by others, from algebr, a bonester; by Menage from algibarat, the restitution of things broken.] A peculiar kind of arithmetick, which takes the quantity sought, whether it be a number or a line, or any other quantity, as if it were granted; and, by means of one or more quantities given, proceeds by consequence, till the quantity (at first only supposed to be known, or at least some power thereof) is found to be equal to some quantity or quantities, which are known; and consequently itself is known. This art was in use among the Arabs, long before it came into this part of the world; and they are supposed to have borrowed it, from the Persians, and the Persians from the Indians. The first Greek author of algebra was Diophantus; who, about the year 800, wrote thirteen books: in 1414, Lucas Paciolius (or Lucas de Burgos) a cordelier, printed a treatise of algebra in Italian, at Venice: he says, that algebra came originally from the Arabs. After several improvements, by Vicla, Oughtryd, Harriot, Descartes; Sir Isaac Newton brought this art to the height, in which it still continues.  —Trev. Cham. It would surely require a very profound skill in algebra, to reduce the difference of mineuse in thirty shillings.

The king was disquieted, when he found that, the prince was totally aliened from all thoughts of, or inclination to, the marriage. Crellion. To ALIENATE. v. a. [from To alienate.] That, of which the property may be transferred. Law is alienable, and treasure is transitory; and both must pass from him, by his own voluntary act, or by the violence of others, or at least by fate. Bacon's Letters. To ALIENATE. adj. [from To alienate.] That, of which the property may be transferred. The countries of the Turks were once Christian, and members of the church; and where the golden candlesticks did stand; though now they be utterly alienated, and no Christians left. Bacon. To withdraw the heart or affections: with the particle from, where the first possessor is mentioned. The manner of men's writing must not alienate our hearts from the truth. Hooker. Be it never so true, which we teach the world to believe; yet, if once their affections begin to be alienated, a small thing persuadeth them to change their opinions. Hooker. His eyes survey'd the dark idolatries Of alienated Judah. Milton's Par. Lost. Any thing, that is apt to disturb the world, and to alienate the affections of men from one another, such as cross and distasteful offices; is, either expressly, or by clear consequence and defection, forbidden in the New Testament. Tertullian. Her mind was alienated, from the honest Cassilius; whom she was taught to look upon, as a formal old fellow. Addison. ALIENATE. adj. [alienatus, Lat.] Withdrawn from; stranger to: with the particle from. The Whigs are damnable wicked; impatient, for the death of the queen; ready to gratify their ambition and revenge by all desperate methods; wholly alienated, from truth, law, religion, mercy, conscience, or honour. Swift's Miscellanies. ALIENATION. n. s. [alienatio, Lat.] 1. The act of transferring property. This ordinance was, for the maintenance of their church in Ireland, and for excluding all inovation or alienation thereof unto strangers. Spencer's State of Ireland. God put it into the heart of one of our princes, to give a check to sacrilege. Her successor passed a law, which prevented all future alienations of the church revenues. Atterbury. Great changes and alienations of property have created new and great dependencies. Swift on Albania and Rome.

2. The state, of being alienated; as, the state was wasted during its alienation.

3. Change of affection.
ALI

It is left, but in dark memory; what was the ground of his defection, and the alienation of his heart from the king:

4. Applied to the mind, it means disorder of the faculties.

Some things are done by man, though not through outward force and impulsion; though not against, yet without, their wills: as, in alienation of mind, or any higher or invincible utterance of wit and judgment.

Hooker.

There is alighted, at your gate,

A young Venetian.

Shakep. Mer. of Venice.

Starkweather's worms; but thar sure traveller,

Though he alighted sometimes, still goeth on.

Herbert.

When marching with his foot, he walks till night;

When with his horse, he never will alight.

Dryden.

When Dedalus, to fly the Cretan shore,

His heavy limbs onjointed pinions borne;

To the Cunean coast, at length he came;

And, here alighted, built this rock his frame.

Dryden's Erec.

When he was admonished by his subject to descend, but that he was too gentle, and circling to the air, and singing to the ground: like a lark, melodious in her mounting, and continuing her song till she alighted, still preparing for a higher flight, at her next Sally.

Dryden.

When finishe'd was the flight,

The victor from their lazy steeds alight;

Like them, dismounted all the wildfire train.

Dryden.

Should a spirit of superior rank, a stranger to human nature, alight upon the earth, what would be his notions of us be? Addison, Spectator.

2. It is used also, of any thing thrown or falling; to fall upon.

But storms of stones, from the proud temple's height.

Pour down; and, on our batter'd helms, alight.

Dryden.

ALIKE, adv. [from a and like.] With resemblance; without difference; in the same manner; in the same form. In some expressions, it has the expression of an adjective, but is always an adverb.

The darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth, as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee. Psal. cxlii. 12.

With thee conversing, I forget all time;

All seasons, and their change, all please alike.

Paradise Lost.

Riches cannot rescue from the grave,

Which claims alike the monarch and the slave.

Vol. I.

ALI

Let us unite, at least in an equal zeal, for these capital doctrines; which all equally embrace, and are alike concerned to maintain. Atterbury.

Two hundred wait the throne; alight, in place;

But differing far, in figure and in face.

Peope.

ALIMENT. n. s. [alimentum, Lat.]

Nourishment; that, which nourishes; nutriment; food.

New parts are added, to our substance; and, as we die, we are born, daily; nor can we get an account, how the aliminent is prepared for nutrition; or, by what mechanism, it is distributed.

General Continuas Alimentaria.

All bodies, which (by the animal faculties) can be changed into the fluids and solids of our bodies, are called aliment. The largest sense; by aliment, I understand every thing, which a human creature takes in common diet; as, meat, drink; and seasoning, as salt, spice, vinegar. Arbuthnot.

ALIMENTAL. adj. [from aliment.] That, which has the quality of aliminet; that, which nourishes; that, which feeds.

The sun, that light imparts to all, receives

(From all) its aliment recompense,

In humid exhalations.

Milton's Paradise Lost.

Except they there be, higher and more august, these weeds must losel their aliment sap, and vital

Of its humidities, when the sun in Leo rides,

Forget not, at the foot of every plant;

To sink a circling trench, and daily pour

A just supply of aliment streams;

Exhausted sap recruiting. Philips.

ALIMENTALLY. adv. [from alimental.]

So, as to serve for nourishment.

The substance of gold is invincible, by the powerfull heat; and that, not only alimentally in a substantial mutation, but also medicinally, in any corporeal conversion.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ALIMENTARINESS. n. s. [from alimentary.]

The quality, of being alimentary, or of affording nourishment. Diet.

ALIMENTARY. adj. [from aliment.]

1. That, which belongs or relates to aliment.

The solution of the aliment by mastication is necessary: without it, the aliment could not be disposed for the changes, which it receives, as it passes through the alimentary duct.

Paradise Lost.

2. That, which has the quality of aliment, or the power of nourishing.

I do not think that, water supplies animals, or even plants, with nourishment; but serves, for a vehicle to the alimentary particles, to convey and distribute them to the several parts of the body.

Ray on the Creation.

Of alimentary roots, some are pulpous and very nutritious; as, turnips and carrots. These have a fattening quality.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

ALIMENTATION. n. s. [from aliment.]

1. The power of affording aliment; the quality of nourishing.

The state, of being nourished by assimilation of matter received.

Plants do nourish; inanimate bodies do not: they have an acumen, but no alimentation.

Bacon's Natural History.

ALIMONIOUS. adj. [from alimony.]

That, which nourishes: a word very little in use.

The plethora renders us lean, by suppressing our spirits, whereby they are insensible, or digesting the Alimentary humour into flesh.

Harvey on Consumptions.

ALIMONY. n. s. [alimonia, Lat.]

Alimony signifies that legal proportion of the husband's estate, which, by the sen-} tence of the ecclesiastical court, is allowed to the wife for her maintenance, upon the account of any separation from him; provided, it be not caused by her clémophtn or adultery. Aphthis Parmgurr before they settled breaches and heart.

Till alimony doth them parts.

Hudibras.

ALIQUANT. adj. [aliquaunt. Lat.]

Parts of a number; which, however repeated, will never make up the number exactly; as, 3 is an aliquant of 10; thrice 3 being 9; and four times 3 making 12.

ALIQUOT. adj. [eliquot. Lat.]

Aliquot parts of any number or quantity; such, as will exactly measure it, without any remainder; as, 3 is an aliquot part of 12; because, being taken four times, it will just measure it.

ALIUM. adj. [from alume.] Resembling ale; having qualities of ale.

Sning it, and beating down the yeast, gives it the sweet after taste. Mer. of Venice.

AlLURE. n. s. [allitura. L.]

Nourishment. Diet.

ALIVE. adj. [from a and live.]

1. In a state of life; not dead.

Not well alive, nor wholly dead, they were;

But some faint signs of feeble life appear.

Dryden.

Not youthful kings, in battle seized alive;

Not scornful virgins, who their charms survive.

Dryden.

2. In a figurative sense, unexhausted; undestroyed; active; in full force.

Those good and learned men had reason to wish, that their proceedings might be favoured; and the good affection of such, as incline towards them, kept alive.

Herder.

3. Cheerful; sprightly; full of alacrity.

She was not so much alive, the whole day; if she slept more, than six hours.

Teilus.

The Earl of Northumberland, who was the proudest man alive, could not look upon the destruction of monarchy with any pleasure.

Cherden.

John was quick, and understood business; but no man alive was more careless, in looking into his accounts.

Arbuthnot.

ALKHESEX. n. s. A word used first by Paracels, and adopted by his followers, to signify an universal solvent; or liquor, which has the power of resolving all things into their first principles.

ALKALIESENT. adj. [from alkal.] That, which has a tendency to the properties of an alkali.

All animal diet is alkaliescent or anti-acid.

Arbuthnot.

ALK. n. s. [The word alkali comes from an herb; called by the Egyptians, kali; by us, glasswort. This herb they burnt to ashes; boiled them in water; and, after having evaporated the water, there remained at the bottom a white salt: this they called sal kali, or alkali. It is corrosive; producing putrefaction in animal substances, to which it is applied. Arbuthnot on Aliments Any substance, which, when mingled with acid, produces effervescence and fermentation.

ALKALINE. adj. [from alkali.] That, which has the qualities of alkali.

Any watery liquor will keep an animal from starting very long, by diluting the fluids, and consequently keeping them from an alkaline state. People have lived twenty-four days, upon nothing but water, Arbuthnot.

To ALKALIZATE. v. a. [from alkali.] To make bodies alkaline, by changing their nature, or by mixing alkalies with them.

ALKALIZATE. adj. [from alkali.] That, which has the qualities of alkali; that, which is impregnated with alkali.

The odour of the fixed nitre is very languid, but that which is discovered, being dissolved in hot water, is different, being of kin to that of other alkalize salts. Boyle.

The colour of violets in their syrup, by acid liquors, turns red; and, by acetic and all-alizarine, turns green.

ALKALIZATION. n. s. [from alkali.] The act, of alkalizating, or impregnating bodies with alkali.

ALKANE. n. s. [anchusa, Lat.] The name of a plant. This plant is a species of bugloss, with a red root; brought from the southern parts of France, and used in medicine. Miller.

ALKEENGL. n. s. A medicinal fruit or berry, produced by a plant of the same denomination; popularly also called winter-cherry; the plant bears a near resemblance, to Solarium or Night-shade; whence it is frequently called in Latin by that name, with the addition or epithet of rescurianum. Chambers.

ALKERMES. n. s. In medicine, a term borrowed from the Arabs; denoting a celebrated remedy, of the consistence of a confection; whereas the kermes berries are the basis. The other ingredients are, pippin-cyder, rose-water, sugar, anbergease, musk, cinnamon, aloes wood, pearls, and leaf-gold; but the sweets are usually omitted. The conciilio Alkermes is chiefly made at Montpellier; the grain, which gives it the denomination, is no where found so plentifully, as there. Chambers.

ALL. adj. [All, Æal, ealle, alle, Sax. oll, Welsh; al, Dutch; alle, Germ. &c., Gr.] 1. Being the whole number; every one. Brutus is an honourable man. So are they all, all, honourable men. Shakespeare, Julius Caesar.

To graze the herd all leaving, Deny'd each other. Milton's Paradise Lost. The great encouragement of all, is the assurance of a future reward. Tindalton.

2. Being the whole quantity; every part. Six days thou shalt labour, and do all thy work. Deut. v. 13. Political power I take to be a right of making laws with penalties; and of employing the force of the community, in the execution of such laws, and in the defence of the commonwealth; and all this, only for the public good. Locke.

3. The whole quantity, applied to duration of time. On those pastures cheerful spring, All the year, doth sit and sing: And round, while there Their green backs warms his lively. Crassus.

4. The whole extent of place. Gratiano speaks an infinite deal of nothing, more than any man in all Venice. Shakespeare, Othello, 4. 1.

ALL. ade. [See ALL, adj.]

1. Quite; completely. How is my love all ready forth to come. Spenser.

Know, Rome, that all alone Marcus did fight Within Coriolanus. Shakespeare, Coriolanus.

He swore so loud; That, all amaz'd, the priest let fall the book. Shake. The Saxons could call a comet, a fixed star; which is all one, with stella erratica or cometa. Camden's Remains.

For a large conscience is all one, And signifies the same with none. Hudibras.

Bala, from a silver box distill'd around, Shall all bedew the roots, and scent the sacred grove. Dryden.

I do not remember, he (any where) mentions expressly the title of the first-born; but (all along) keeps himself, under the shade of the indeterminate term, heir. Justice may be furnished out of fire, as far as her sword goes; and courage may be (all) over a continued blaze. Addison.

If the miser disturbs his earnings spare, He thinly spreads them through the public square: Where, all be made the rail, rag'd beggars lie: And, from each other, catch the soulful cry. Gay.

2. Altogether; wholly; without any other consideration. I am of the temper of most kings; who love, to be in debt; are all for present moneys, no matter how they pay it afterward. Dryden.

3. Only; without admission of any thing else. When I shall wed; That lord, whose hand must take my plight, shall marry Half my love with him, half my care and duty: Sure, I shall never marry, like my sister, To love my father all. Shakespeare, King Lear.

4. Although. This sense is truly Teutonic, but now obsolete. Do you now think, the accomplishment of it sufficient work for one man's simple head; All were it, as the rest, but simply writ. Spencer.

5. It is sometimes a word of emphasis; nearly the same with just. A shepherd's swain, say, did thee bring; All as his straying flock, he fed; And, when his honour hath thee read, Crave pardon for thy hardhead. Shakespeare, Pastoral.

Tell us, what occasion of import Hath all so long detain'd you, from your wife. Shakespeare, All.

ALL. n. s.

1. The whole; opposed to part, or nothing. And will she yet debase her eyes on me; On me, whose all not equals Edward's moiety? Shakespeare.

Nought's had, all's spent; Where our desire is got, without content. Shakespeare, Macbeth.

The youth shall study; and no more engage Their flattering wishes, for uncertain age: Shakespeare, All.

2. Every thing. Then shall he news-cramm'd. All the better; we shall be the more remarkable. Shakespeare. Up, with my tent; here will I live to-night; But where, to-morrow?—Well, all's one for that. Shakespeare. All the fitter, Lentulus; our coming Is not for salvation; we have busied our hands. Ben Jonson.

3. That is, every thing is the better, the same, the fitter. Scopere and pow'r, thy giving, I assume; And glad, her shall resign; when, in the end, Thou shalt be all in all, and I in thee. For ever; and in me, all whom thou lov'st. Milton.

They, that do not keep up this indulgency for all but truth, put coloured spectacles before their eyes, and look through false glasses. Locke.

4. The phrase and all is of the same kind. They all fell to work, at the roots of the tree; and left it so little foot-hold, that the first blast and wind laid it flat upon the ground; nest, eagles, and all. L'Estoing. A torch, smel all and, goes out in a moment; when dipped in the water. Addison's Remarks on Italy.

5. All is much used in composition; but, in most instances, it is merely arbitrary; as, all-commanding. Sometimes the words compounded with it, are fixed and classical; as, Almighty. When it is connected with a participle, it seems to be a noun; as, all-surrounding; in other cases an adverb; as, all-accomplished, or completely accomplished. Of these compounds, a small part of those, which may be found, is inserted.

ALL-EARING. adj. [from all and bear.] That, which bears every thing; omniparous. Thus while he spoke, the sovereign plant he drew; Where, on th'all-hearing earth, unmark'd it grew. Pope.

ALL-CHEERING. adj. [from all and cheer.] That, which gives gayety and cheerfulness to all. Soon, as the all-cheering sun Should, in the fearless east, begin to draw The shaly curtains from Aurora's bed. Shakespeare.

ALL-COMMANDING. adj. [from all and command.] Having the sovereignty over all. He now sets before them the high and shining idol of glory; the all-commanding image of bright gold. Raleigh.

ALL-COMPOSING. adj. [from all and compose.] That, which quiets all men, or every thing. Wreath in emulous shades, Ulysses lies, His woes forgot; but Pallas now addresses, To break the bands of all-composing rest. Pope.

ALL-COURNERING. adj. [from all and con-quer.] That, which subdues every thing. Second of Satan sprung, all-conquerer death! What thinkst thou of our empire now? Milton.

ALL-CONSUMING. adj. [from all and consume.] That, which consumes every thing.
A L L

By age unbrok — but all-consuming care
Destroying through the strength, that time would spare.

Pope.

ALL-DEVOURING. adj. [from all and devour.] That which eats up everything.

Secure from flames, from envy's Yorker rage,
Destructive, all-devouring agé.
Pope.

ALL-FOURS. n.s. [from all and four.] A low game at cards, played by two; so named, from the four particulars by which it is reckoned; and which, joined in the hand of either of the parties, are said to make all-fours.

All-hail! n.s. [from all and hail, for health.] All health! This is therefore not a compound, though perhaps usually reckoned among them; a term of salutation. All, or all-hail.

All hail, ye fields, where constant peace attends
All hail, ye books, my true, my real friends,
Whose conversation pleasure and improvement.
Webb.

All-hallow. n.s. [from all and hallow.] All saints day; the first of November.

All-hallow-day. adj. [from all and hallow, to make holy.] The time, about all saints day.

All-hallow-tide. n.s. [See All-hallow-day.] The term, near all saints, or the first of November.

Cut off the bough about All-hallowtide, in the bare place; we set it in the ground; and it will grow, to be a fair tree in our year.

Bacon's Natural History.

All-heal. n.s. [penas, Lat.] A species of ironwort; which see.

All-judging. adj. [from all and judge.] That, which has the sovereign right of judgment.

I look with horror back,
That I detest my wretched self, and curse
My past polluted life. All-judging Heaven,
Who knows my crimes, has seen my sorrow for them.

All-knowing. adj. [from all and know.] Omniscient; all-wise.

Shall we repine, at a little misplaced charity;
We, who could no way foresee the effect? When in all-knowing, all-wise Being, shower down every day his benefits on the thankless and undeserving.

Mather's Sermons.

All-making. adj. [from all and make.] That, created all; omnific. See All-seeing.

All-powerful. adj. [from all and powerful] Almighty; omnipotent; possessed of infinite power.

O all-powerful Be! the least motion of whose will can create or destroy a world; pity us, the miserable friends of thy distressed servant. Scott.

All-saints-day. n.s. The day, on which there is a general celebration of the saints. The first of November.

All-seer. n.s. [from all and see.] He, that sees or beholds every thing; he, whose view comprehends all things.

That high All-seer, which I dallied with,
Hath turn'd my feigned prayer on my head;
And given in earnest, what I begg'd in jest.
Shaksp.

All-seeing. adj. [from all and see.] That beholds every thing.

A L L

The same first Mover certain bounds has plac'd,
How long those perishable forms shall last:
Nor can they last, beyond the time, assign'd
By that all-creating, and all-creating mind. Dryden.

All-souls. n.s. The day, on which supplications are made for all souls by the church of Rome; the second of November.

That is all-souls day, fellows! Is it not?—
It is, my lord.
Why then, all-souls day is my body's doomsday.
Shaksp.

All-sufficient. adj. [from all and sufficient.] Sufficient to every thing. The testimonies of God are perfect: the testimonies of God are all-sufficient unto that end, for which they were given.

He can more than employ all on powers in their utmost elevation; for he is every way perfect and all-sufficient.
Norris.

All-wise. adj. [from all and wise.] Possess of infinite wisdom.

There is an infinite, eternal, all-wise mind, governing the affairs of the world.
South.

All-wise, eternal, potentate!
Shakespeare's Henry IV.

All-hallowtide. n.s. [See All-hallow-day.] The term, near all saints, or the first of November.

To make one's self a king by the blood of thousands.

Prioz.

Allantois, allaitoïdes. n.s. [from a lat. a, and allait.] The urinary tunnic, placed between the amnion and chorion; which, by the navel and urachus (or passage, by which the urine is conveyed from the infant in the womb) receives the urine, that comes out of the bladder.

Quinquis.

To ALLAY. v.a. [from allay, Fr.] To mix one metal with another, in order to coinage: it is therefore derived by some, from a la loi, according to law; the quantity of metals being mixed, according to law; by others, from allier, to unite; perhaps from allocere, to put together.

1. To mix one metal with another, to make it fitter for coinage. In this sense, most authors preserve original French orthography, and write alleay. See Alloay.

2. To join any thing to any other, so as to abate its predominant qualities; it is used commonly, in a sense contrary to its original meaning; and is, to make something bad, less bad. To obtund; to repress; to abate.

Being brought into the open air, I would allow the burning quality
Of that fell passion.
Shaksp.

No friendly offices shall alter or allay that raucour, that frets in some hellish breasts; which, upon all occasions, will turn out at its foul warrant in slander and invective.
South.

3. To quiet; to pacify; to repress.
The word, in this sense, I think not to be derived from the French allayer; but to be the English word lay, with a before it, according to the old form.

If by your art you have Put the wild wilds in this in, allay them. Shaksp.

QUIN.

ALLAY. n.s. [allay, Fr.]

1. The metal of a base kind, in coins, to harden them, that they may wear less. Gold is allayed, with silver and copper; two carats, to a pound Troy; silver, with copper only; of which eighteen penny-weight is mixed with a pound. Cowell thinks the alloy is added, to counterbalance the charge of coinage; which might have been done, only by making the coin less.

For fools are stumbleth by their folly.
As coins are harden'd by th' alloy. J. Milton.

2. Any thing, which (being added) abates the predominant qualities of that, with which it is mingled; in the same manner, as the adnixture of baser metals allays the qualities of the first mass.

Dull colours easily suffer a small alloy, by little scattering light.
Newton's Opticks.

3. Alloy, being taken from baser metals, commonly implies something worse than that, with which it is mixed.

The joy has no alloy, of jealousy, hope, and fear.
Rid. Common.

ALLAYER. n.s. [from allay.] The person or thing, which has the power or quality of allaying.

Phlegnum and pure blood are used allayers of certainness; and Avicenna countermands letting blood be for various disorders, as the blood a fœnum bilis, or a blade of gall, obtunding its serenity and fierce.
Harve.

Allegation. n.s. [from alleg.] That, which has the power of allaying or abating the force of another.

If I could temporize with my affection, or brew it to a weak and colder palate;
The like allayment would I give my grief. Shaksp.

ALLEGATION. n.s. [from alleg.] 1. Affirmation; declaration.
2. The thing alleged or affirmed.
3. An excuse; a plea.

I omitted no means, to be informed of my errors; and I expect not to be excused in any negligence, or account of youth, want of leisure, or any other idle allegations.

To ALLEG. v.a. [allege, Lat.] 1. To affirm; to declare; to maintain.
2. To plead, as an excuse; or produce, as an argument.

Surely the present form of church-government is such, as no law of God, or reason of man, hath hitherto been alleged of force sufficient, to produce any do ill; who, to the utmost of their power, withstand the alteration thereof. Hooker.

If we forsake the ways of grace or goodness, we cannot allege any colour of ignorance, or want of instruction; we cannot say, we have not learned them, or we could not.
Sprat.

He hath a clear and full view; and there is no more to be alleged, for his better information.
Locke.

ALLEGABLE. adj. [from alleg.] That, which may be alleged.

Upon this interpretation, all may be alleged, by alleging against it. Brown's Jugg. Erro.

ALLEGEMENT. n.s. [from alleg.] The same with allegation.

Dict.

ALLEGER. n.s. [from alleg.] He, that alleges.

The narrative, if we believe it as confidently, as the famous allegor of it (Pampillo) appears to do, would argue; that there is no other principle requisite, than what may result from the lucky mixture of several bodies.
Pope.

ALLEGANCE. n.s. [allegation, Fr.] The duty of subjects to the government.

I did pluck allegiance from men's hearts.
loud shouts and salutations from their mouths.
Even in the presence of the crowned king. Shaksp.
We charge you, on allegiance to ourselves,
To hold your slaughtering hands, and keep the peace.

Shakespeare.

The powers of common, whom every day,
Petitions are directed by the several counties
Of England, professing allegiance to them, govern
Almost the utmost in the lord concurrence, or rather sub-, mitting, to whatsoever is proposed.

Clarendon.

ALLEGIANT, adj. [from allega.] Loyal;
conformable to the duty of allegiance;

a word, not now used.

For your great graces,
Heal'd upon you; poor impersoner! I
Can nothing render, but allegiance thanks,
My prayers to heaven for you.

Shakespeare Henry VIII.

ALLEGORIC, adj. [from allegory.] After the manner of an allegory; not real,
not literal.

A kingdom they pretend to; but, what kings,
Red or allegor. I diecon not.

Milton.

ALLEGORICAL, adj. [from allegory.]
In th- form of an allegory; not real,
not literal; mystical.

When our Saviour said, in an allegorical and mystical sense; 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you,' the hearers understood him literally and grossly.

Percy.

The best poet of Apollo for shooting, is capable of two applications; one literal, in respect of the darts and bow, the ensigns of that god; the other allegorical, in regard to the rays of the sun.

Pope.

ALLEGORICALY, adv. [from allegory.]

After an allegorical manner.

Virgil often makes Iris the messenger of Juno, allegorically taken for the wind.

Popeam.

All the figures of speech are understood allegorically; and,
what is thus spoken by a Pheasant with wisdom,
is (by the Poet) applied to the goddess of it.

Pope.

ALLEGORICALNESS, n.s. [from allegorical.]
The quality of being allegorical.

Diet.

To ALLEGORIZE v. a. (from allegory.)
To turn into allegory; to form an allegory; to take in a sense not literal.

He hath very wittily allegoriz'd this tree; allowing his supposition of the tree itself to be true.

Beauch.

As some would allegorize these signs, so others would confine them to the destruction of Jerusalem.

Burnet's History.

An alchemist shall reduce dignity, to the maxims of his laboratory; explain morality by salt, sulphur, and mercury; and allegorize the scripture itself, and the sacred mysteries thereto, into the philosopher's stone.

Locke.

ALLEGORY, n.s. [allegoría.] A figurative discourse; in which something other is intended, than is contained in the words literally taken; as, wealth is the daughter of alliance, and the parent of authority.

Neither must we draw out one allegory too long; lest either we make ourselves obscure; or fall into affectation, which is childish. De Janv.

This word symbola nunyth nothing else, but (by allegory) the vegetative humour or moisture, that quicketh, and giveth life to trees and flowers, whereby they grow.

Poeam.

ALLEGRO, n.s. A word, denoting one of the six distinctions of time. It expresses a sprightly motion, the quickest of all, except Presto. It originally meant gay, as in Milton.

ALLELUJAH, n.s. [This word is falsely written for Halilujah, הולווחי and הולוי] A word of spiritual exultation, used in lawyers; it signifies, Praise unto God.

He will set his tongue, to those pious divine strains; which may be a pr per praedicatm to thos e alleluia, he hopes eternally to sing.

Government of the Tongue.

ALLEMANDE n.s. [Ital.] A grave kind of music.

Dict.

To ALLEVIATE. v.a. [altero, Lat.]
1. To make light; to ease; to soften.

The pains, taken in the speculative, will much allovate me in describing the practice part.

Hervey.

Most of the distempers are the effects of abuses plenty and luxury, and must not be charged upon our Sinner: who (not understanding) hath provided excellent medicines, to alleviate those evils, which we bring upon ourselves.

Bentley.

2. To extenuate or soften; as, he allevitates his fault by an excuse.

ALLEVIATION. n.s. [from allenate.]

1. The act, of making light, of allaying, or extenuating.

All apologies for, and alleviations of, faults, though they are the heights of humanity; yet they are not the favours, but the duties of friendship.

South.

2. That, by which any pain is eased, or fault extenuated.

This loss of one-fifth of their income will sit heavy on them, who shall feel it, without the allivation of any profit.

Locke.

ALLEY. n.s. [alle, Fr.].

1. A walk in a garden.

And all within are walks and alleys wide,
With foot ing worn, and leading toward the rose.

Spencer.

Where alleys are close gravedell, the earth putth forth with the first year's verdure, and a bushy grass.

Bacoon's Natural History.

Yonder alley green,
Our walk at noon, with branches overgrown.

Milton.

Come, my fair love! Our morning's task we lose;
Some labour, 'tis the easiest life would choose;
Ours is not great, the dashing bows to erope,
Whose too luxuriant growth our alley stopp'd.

Dryden.

The thriving plants, ignoble brownlings made,
Now solve those alleys they were born to hide,

Pope.

2. A passage in towns, narrower than a street.

A back friend, a shoulder clapper; one, that commands the passages of alleys, creek's, and narrow lands.

Shakespeare.

ALLIE. n.s. [alliance, Fr.].

1. The state of connection with another, by confederacy; a league. In this sense, our histories of Queen Anne mention the grand alliance.

2. Relation by marriage.

A bloody Bruenish stud, th' alliance join'd,
Between the Tyrian and th' Anusonian line.

Dryden.

3. Relation, by any forms of kindred.

For my father's sake,
And for alliance's sake, declare the cause.

Shakespeare. Henry VI.

Admit it, with goodwill to your heart, shall join
In dire alliance with the Théan line:
Tis the battle, which we shall rise, and mortal war succeed.

Pope.

4. The act of forming or contracting relation to another; the act of making a confederacy.

Dorset, your son, that with a fearful soul
Leads disconsolate steps in foreign soil,
This fair after thee, quickly shall call home.

To high promotion.

Shakespeare. Richard III.

5. The persons allied to each other.
I would not boast the greatness of my father,
But point out new alliances to Cato. Addison.

ALLIENCY. [allieo, Lat. to entice or draw.] The power of attracting any thing; magnetism; attraction.

The Anglo-Saxon word for this art is a word and the manner of it, still occult.

Grenville.

of being so tied.

2. The arithmetical rule, that teaches to adjust the price of compounds, formed of several ingredients of different value.

ALLIGATOR. n.s. The crocodile. This name is chiefly used for the crocodile of America; between which, and that of Africa, naturalists have laid down this discrimination: that the former has the upper, and the other the lower jaw; but this is now known to be chimerical, the lower jaw being equally moved by both.

See Crocodile.

In his nicely shop a tortoise hung,
An alligator staid, and other skins
Of fish and fowl's.

Shakespeare.

Alot in rows large poppies' heads were strong,
And here a scalable alligator hung, Garth's Dictionary.

another.

There have not been any islands of note, or considerable extent, torn and cast off from the continent by earthquakes, or severed from it by the boisterous allusion of the sea. Wordsworth.

ALLITERATION. n.s. [ad and iterus, Lat.] Of the things called the alliteration, being several words in the same verse with the same letter;
there are instances, in the eldest and best writers, as Belemonth biggest born. Milton's Paradise Lost.

term, used in the Exchequer.

Chambers.

ALLUCTION. n.s. [allest, Lat.] The act of speaking to another.

Allodial. adj. [from allium.] Held without any acknowledgment of superiority; not feudal; independent.

ALLODIUM. n.s. [A word of very uncertain derivation, but most probably of German original.] A possession, held in absolute independence, without any acknowledgment of a lord paramount:
It is opposed to fee, or feudalum, which intimates some kind of dependence.

There are no allodial lands in England;
all being held, either mediatutely or immediately, of the king.
ALLONgE. n.s. [alloigne, Fr.] 1. A pass or thrust with a rapier; so called from the lengthening of the blade, taken up by the fencer. 2. It is likewise taken for a long reign, when the horse is trotted in the hand.

To AlLO'o. v.a. [This word is generally spoken hallo; and is used to dogs, when they are incited to the chase or battle; it is commonly imagined to come from the French allons; perhaps from alla, look all; shewing the object.] To set on; to incite a dog, by crying allo.

ALLOQUY. n.s. [alloquium, Lat.] The act, of speaking to another; address; conversation.

To ALLOT. v.a. [from allot.] 1. To distribute by lot. 2. To grant.

ALLOTMENT. n.s. [from allot.] 1. That, which is allotted to any one; the part, the share, the portion, granted.

Part appropriated.

ALLOTTERY. n.s. [from allot.] That, which is granted to any particular person in a distribution, See ALLOTMENT. Allow me such exercises, as may become a gentleman; or give me the poor alotted, my father left me by testament. Shakespeare.

To ALLOW. v.a. [allow, Fr. from allouer, Lat.] 1. To admit; as, to allow a position; not to contradict; not to oppose.

The principles, which all mankind allow for true, are innate; those, that men of right reason admit, are the principles allowed by all mankind.

The power of music all our hearts allow; And, what Timotheus was, is Dryden now. Pope.

That some of the Persians, allowed openly against the king's murder, I allow to be true. Swift.

To justify; to maintain, as right.

The powers above

Allow obedience.

The Lord alloweth the rightous. Bible.

3. To grant; to yield; to own any one's title to.

We will not, in civility, allow too much sincerity to the professions of most men; but think their actions to be interceptors of their thoughts.

I shall be ready, to allow the pope as little power here, as you please. Swift.

4. To grant license to; to permit.

ALLOWABLE. adj. [from allow.] 1. That, which may be admitted without contradiction.

It is not allowable, what is observable in many pieces of Raphael; where Magidian is represented before our Saviour, with his feet on his knees; which will not consist with the text.

Brown's Vulg. Errors.

2. That, which is permitted or licensed; lawful; not forbidden.

In action of this sort, the light of nature alone may discover that, which is in the sight of God allowable.

Hobbes.

I was, by the freedom allowable amongst friends, tempted to vent my thoughts with negligence.

Pope.

Reputation becomes a signal and a very particular blessing, to magnifiers; and their pursuit of it is, not only allowable, but laudable.

Attewber's Sermon.

ALLOWABleness. n.s. [from allowable.] The quality of being allowable; lawfulness; exemption from prohibition.

Lots, as to their nature, use, and allowance, in matters of recreation, are indeed impugned by some, though better defended by others.

South's Sermon.

ALLOWANCE. n.s. [from allow.] 1. Admission, without contradiction.

That, which wisdom did first begin, and hath been with good men long continued, challenged allowance of them that succeed, although it plead for itself nothing.

Hobbes.

Without the notion and allowance of spirits, our philosophy will be lame and defective in one main part of it.

Leck.

2. Sanction; license; authority.

You sent a large commission to conclude (Without the king's will, or the state's allowance) A league, between his Highness and Wiven."—Shakespeare.

3. Permission; freedom from restraint.

They should therefore be accustomed betimes, to consult and make use of their reason, before they give allowance to their inclinations.

Leck.

4. A settled rate, or appointment for any use.

The victual in plantations ought to be expended, almost as in a besieged town; that is, with certain allowance.

And his allowance was a continual allowance given him of the king; a daily rate, for every day all his life. 2 Kings.

5. Abatement, from the strict rigor of a law or demand.

The whole power, though written in hieroglyphics, is, of the Fountains nature; as in the thought, as the expression: and, as much, requires the same degree of allowance for it.

Davies on Ireland.

Parents never give allowances, for an innocent passion.

Sawt.

6. Established character; reputation.

His bark is sturdily shivered, and his pilot, Of my expert and approved allowance. Shakespeare.

ALLOY. n.s. [See ALLOY.] 1. Baser metal, mixed in coinage. That precise weight and fineness, by law appropriated to the pieces of each denomination, is called the standard. Fine silver is silver, without the mixture of any other metal; Alloy is baser metal, mixed with it.

Let another piece be coined of the same weight; wherein half the silver is taken out, and copper or other alloy put into the piece; it will be worth, but half as much; for the value of the alloy is so inconsiderable, as not to be reckoned.

Leck.

2. Abatement; diminution.

The pleasures of sense are probably relished, by heirs in a more exquisite degree, than they are by men; for they taste them sincerely, and pure, without mixture or alloy. Atewber.

ALLOBSCENCY. n.s. [allebescence, Lat.] Willingness; content.

Diet.

To ALLUDE. v.n. [allude, Lat.] To have some reference to a thing, without the direct mention of it; to hint at; to insinuate. It is used of persons; as, he alludes to an old story; or of things, as the lampoon alludes to his mother's faults.

These speeches of Jeron and Chryssostom do seem, as a reply unto such ministerial arraignments, as were then in use.

Hobbes.

True it is, that many things of this nature be allowable, yes, many things declared. Hobbes.

Then just proportions were taken, and every thing placed by weight and measure; and this, I doubt not, was that artificial structure here alluded to. Burnet's Theory.

ALLOMINOR. n.s. [allominor, Fr. to light.] One, who colours or paints upon paper or parchment; because he gives graces, light, and ornament, to the letters or figures coloured.

Cowell.

To ALLURE. v.a. [leurer, Fr. looren, Dutch; belewen, Sax.] To entice to any thing, whether good or bad; to draw towards any thing by enticement.

Unto laws, that men make for the benefit of men, it hath seemed also helpful to add rewards which may move allure unto good, than any hardships deterreth from it; and punishments, which may render one from evil, than any sweetness allureth to allurement.

Hobbes.

The golden sun, in splendour, likest heaven. After the eye. Milton's Paradise Lost.

Each sly ring influence, and each allureth to Ligeieth.

ALLUR'E. n.s. [from the verb allure.] Something set up, to entice birds (or other things) to it. We now write lure.

The rather to train them to his allure, he told them both again; and, with a vehement voice, these were over-topped and trodden down by gentlemen. Haywood.

ALLEUREMENT. n.s. [from allure.] That, which allures, or has the force of alluring; enticement; temptation of pleasure.
ALL

Against allurement, custom, and a world
Offended; fearless of reproach and scorn,
Or unless Milton's Paradise Lost.
—Adam, by his wife's allurement, fell.

Paradise Regained.

To shun th' allurement, is not hard
To minds read'sd, warn'd, and well prepar'd;
But, words are difficult, when once hesit.
To struggle through the straits, and break't in
To allure, by Dryden.

Allurer. n.s. [from allure.] The person, that allures; cuiter; inveigler.

Allusion. n.s. [alius, Lat.] That, which is spoken with reference to something, supposed to be already known, and therefore not expressed; a hint; an implication. It has the particle to.

Here are manifest allusions and foot-steps of the divinity of the earth, as it was in the beginning, and will be in its last ruin.

Burnet's Theory.

This last allusion gall'd the Panther more;
Because indeed it rebel'd upon its own digits.
Dryden. Expressions now out of use, allusion to customs lost to us, and various particularities, must needs continue several passages in the dark.
Leck. Allusive. adj. [alldro, allusum, Lat.] Hintsing at something not fully expressed.

Where the expression in one place is plain, and the sense alluded to agreeable to the proper force of the words, and no negative objection requires us to depart from it; and the expression, in the other, is figurative or allusive, and the doctrine, deduced from it, liable to great objections; it is reasonable, in this latter place, to restrain the extent of the figure and allusion to a consistency with the former.
Rogers. Sermon.

Allusively. adv. [from allus.] In an allusive manner; by implication; by insinuation.

The Jewish nation, that rejected and crucified him, within the compass of one generation, were, according to his prediction, destroyed by the Romans, and taken up by those eagles. (Matt. xxiv. 33.) by which, allusively, are noted the Roman armies, whose ensign was the eagle.

Hammond.

Allusiveness. n.s. [from al/us.] The quality of being allusive.

Alluvious. adj. [from allus.] That, which is carried by water to another place, and lodged upon something else.

To Ally. n.a. [allier, Fr.]

1. To unite by kindred, friendship, or confederacy.

All these sept are allied, to the inhabitants of the North; so, as there is no hope, that they will ever serve faithfully against them.

Wrenner in Ireland.

Want, frailties, passions, closer still ally
The common interest, or endure the yoke.
Pope.

To Deponent.

From him they draw the animating fire.
Thomson.

2. To make a relation, between two things, by similitude, or resemblance, or any other means.

Two lines are indeed remotely allied to Virgil's sense; but they are too like the tenderness of Ovid.

All'y. n.s. [elle, Fr.] One, united by some means of connection; as marriage, friendship, confederacy.

He in court stood, on his own feet; for the most of his allies, rather leaned upon him, than shone him.
Warton.

ALMACANTAR. n.s. [An Arabick word, written variously by various authors; by D'Herbelot, almocantar; by others, alunocantar.] A circle, drawn parallel to the horizon. It is generally used in the plural; and means a series of parallel circles, drawn through the several degrees of the meridian.

ALMACANTAR'S Staff. n.s. An instrument, commonly made of pear-tree wood, or box, with an arch of fifteen degrees; used to take observations of the sun, about the time of its rising and setting, in order to find the amplitude, and consequently the variation of the compass.

Chambers.

ALMANACK. n.s. [Derived, by some, from the Arabick al, and manah, Heb. to count or compute; by others, from al, Arabick, and man, a month, indicates the course of the months; by others, from a Teutonick original; al, and man, the moon, an account of every moon, or month. All of them are probable.] A calendar; a book, in which the revolutions of the seasons, with the return of feasts and fasts, is noted for the ensuing year.

It will be said, this is an almanack for the old year; all hath been well: Spain hath not assailed this kingdom.
Byron.

This astrologer made his almanack give a tolerable account of the weather, by a direct inversion of the common prognosticators.

Government of the Tongue.

Beware the woman too, and shun her sight,
Who in these studies does herself delight;
By whom a greasy almanack is borne,
With often handling, like chaff anther worn.

Dryden.

I'll have a fasting almanack printed, on purpose for her use.

Dryden's Spanish Friar.

ALMAHINE. n.s. [Fr. almanache, Ital.] A ruby, coarser and lighter than the oriental, and nearer the colour of the garnet.

Diet.

Almightiness. n.s. [from almighty.] Unlimited power; omnipotence; one of the attributes of God.

It serveth to the world, for a witness of his almightiness, whom we outwardly honour with the object of outward things.
Houter.

In creating and making existent the world universal, by the absolute act of his own word, God shewed his power and almightiness.
Sir Walter Raleigh.

ALM

In the wilderness, the bitttern and the stork, the unicorn and the elk, live upon his provisions, and receive his power, and feel the force of his almightiness.

Taylor.

Almighty. adj. [from all and mighty.] Of unlimited power; omnipotent.

The Lord appeared unto Abraham; and said unto him, I am the almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect.
Genesis, xvii. 1. He wills you, in the name of God almighty;
That you divest yourself, and be apart.
The borrowed glories; that, by gift of heart,
By law of nature and nations, long
To him and to his heirs.
Shakespeare.

ALMOND. n.s. [amand, Fr. derived by Menage from amandula, a word in low Latin: by others, from Allemand, a German; supposing, that almonds come to France from Germany.] The nut of the almond tree, either sweet or bitter.

Pour an almond, and the clear white colour will be altered into a dirty one; and the sweet taste, into an oily one.
Leck.

ALMOND-Tree. n.s. [amgdalus, Lat.] It has leaves and flowers, very like those of the peach tree; but the fruit is longer, and more compressed; the outer green coat is thinner and drier when ripe, and the shell is not so rugged.

Milles.

Like to an almond-tree, mounted high
On top of Green Selents, all alone.
With blossoms brave bededcked daintily;
Whose tender locks do tremble every one.
At every little breath that under heaven's blown.
Fairy Queen.

Mark well the flowing almonds in the wood:
If o'f yon blooms the bearing branches load,
The glebe will answer to the syren reign;
Great heats will follow, and large crops of grain.

Dryden.

Almonds of the throat, or Tongues, (called improperly, almonds of the ears) are two round glands, placed on the sides of the basis of the tongue, under the common membrane of the fauces; each of them has a large oval sinus, which opens into the fauces; and in it are a great number of lesser ones, which discharge themselves through the great sinus of a mucous and slippery matter into the fauces, larynx, and esophagus, for the moistening and lubricating those parts. When the esophagus muscle acts, it compresses the almonds, and they frequently are the occasion of a sore throat.

Quincy.

The tonsils, or almonds of the ears, are also frequently swollen in this lung's evil; which tumour may be very well reckoned a species of it.
Wrenner's Surgery.

ALMOND-FURNACE, or Alman-Furnace. called also the Sweep; is a peculiar kind of furnace, used in refining, to separate metals from cinders and other foreign substances.

Chambers.

ALMONER, of Almner. n.s. [eleemosynarius, Lat.] The officer of a prince, or other person, employed in the distribution of charity.

I enquired for an almoner; and the general answer had pointed out your reverence, as the worthyest man.
Dryden.
ALMONRY. n. s. [from almoner.] The place where the almoner resides, or where the alms are distributed.

ALMOST. adv. [from all and most; that is, most part of all. Skinner.] Nearly; well nigh: in the next degree, to the whole, or to universality.

ALMS. n. s. [In Saxon, elm, from elecemosyna, Lat.] What is given gratuitously, in relief of the poor. It has no singular.

ALMS-BASKET. n. s. [from alms and basket.] The basket, in which provisions are put to be given away.

ALMS-DEED. n. s. [from alms and deed.] An act of charity; a charitable gift.

ALMS-GIVER. n. s. [from alms and giver.] He, that gives alms; he, that supports others by his charity.

ALMS-HOUSE. n. s. [from alms and house.] A house, devoted to the reception and support of the poor; an hospital for the Poor.

ALMS-MAN. n. s. [from alms and man.] A man, who lives upon alms; who is supported by alms.

ALMS-REEVER. n. s. A tree, mentioned in scripture. Of its wood were made musical instruments; and it was used also, in rails, or in a staircase. The Rabbins generally render it corai, others couvy, brazil or pine; in the Septuagint, it is translated wornget wood; and in the Vulgate, Linaga Thyina; but coral could never answer the purpose of the almsreever; the pine-tree is too common in Judea, to be imported from Ophir; and the Typhion or ebron-tree, much esteemed by the ancients for its fragrance and beauty, came from Mauritania. By the wood almangin, or aligmim, or simply gymnium, taking al for a kind of article, may be understood oily and gummy sorts of wood; and particularly the trees, which produce gum algamim, or gum arabick; and is (perhaps) the same, with the Shittin wood mentioned by Moses.

And the navy also of Hiram, that brought gold from Ophir, brought in from Ophir great plenty of almangin-trees and precious trees.

1 Kings, x. 11

HAIN NAGAR, HAIN NGER, or HAIN OR. n. s. [from alnarge.] A measure by the ell: a sworn officer; whose business formerly was, to inspect the assize of woolen cloth, and to fix the seals appointed upon it for that purpose: but there are now three officers, belonging to the regulation of cloth-manufatures; the scarcher, measureur, and alnager. Dict.

ALNAGER. n. s. [from aulnage, or aulnage, Fr.] Ell-measure, or rather the measuring by the ell or yard. Dict.

ALNIGHT. n. s. [from all and night.] A service, which they all night, is a great care of wax, with the wick in the butt; whereby it cometh to pass, that the wick fetcheth the nourishment farther off. Bacon.

ALOES. n. s. [Σημεριλος, as it is supposed.] A term, applied to three different things.

1. A precious wood, used in the East for perfumes; of which the best sort is of higher price than gold; and was the most valuable present, given by the king of Siam, in 1686, to the king of France; it is called Tambar; and is the heart, or innermost part, of the aloe tree; the next part to which is called Callandra; which is sometimes imported into Europe, and (though of inferior value to the Tambar) is much esteemed: the part, next the bark, is termed by the Portuguese Paço da quela, or eadge-wood; but some account the eadge-wood not the outer part of the Tambar, but another species. Our knowledge of this wood is yet very imperfect. Savary.

2. Aloe is a tree, which grows in hot countries, and even in the mountains of Spain.

3. Aloe is a medicinal juice, extracted, not from the odoriferous, but the common aloe tree; by cutting the leaves, and exposing the juice (that drops from them) to the sun. It is distinguished, into Socotrine, and Caballine or horse aloe: the first is so called, from Nocorera; the second, because (being coarser) it ought to be confined to the use of farriers. It is a warm and strong cathartic.

ALOE-TLICAL. adj. [from aloe.] Consisting chiefly of aloe.

It may be executed, by aleritical, sanomacnium, or agronomical medicines. Wiseman's Surgery.

ALOEICK. n. s. [from aloe.] Any medicine is so called, which chiefly consists of aloe.

ALOFT. adv. [after, to lift up. Dan. Left air, Icelandish; so that aloft is, into the air.] On high; above; in the air: a word, used chiefly in poetry.

For I have read in stories oft, That love his wings, and soars aloft. Suckling.

Upright he stood; and bore aloft his shield, Conspicuous from afar: and overlooked the field. Dryden.

ALOFT. prep. Above.

The great luminary (Aloft the vulgar constellation thick, That hies his lordly eye keen distance due) Dispenses light from far. Milton's Paradise Lost.

ALOGY. n. s. [Συζύγος.] Unreasonableness; absurdity. Dict.

ALOGE. n. [allen, Dutch; freu al and een or one, that is, single.]

1. Without another.

The quarrel toucheth none, but us alone: Between ourselves let us decide it then. Shakespeare.

If by a mortal hand my father's throne Could be defended, 'twas by mine alone. Dryden.

God, by whose alone power and conversation we all live, and move, and have our being. Beatty, Dict.

2. Without company; solitary.

Fathers we see fly along; and they are but sheep, which always hold together. Sidney.

Alone, for other creature in this place, Living or lifeless, to be found was none. Milton.

I never durst in darkness be alone. Dryden.

ALONE. adv.

1. This word is seldom used, but with the word be: if: even then, it is an adverb.

It implies sometimes an ironical prohibition, forbidding to help a man, who is able to manage the affair himself.

Let us alone, to guard Coriol.: If they set down before 's, 'fore they remove, bring out your army. Shakespeare.

Let you alone, cunning arithmet.; See, how his gurgle peers above his gown.

To tell the people in what danger he was. BenJon.

2. To forbear; to leave undone.

His chief stole it; but he had better, have it done; for he lost his cause by his pret. Addison.

ALONG. adv. [en longe, Fr.]

1. At length.

Some rowel a mighty stone; some, laid along.

And bound with burning wires, on specks of which Avemar glides along the lovely lands.

2. Through any space measured lengthwise.

A firebrand carried along, leaves a train of light behind it. Bacon's Natural History.

Where Ucass glides along the lovely lands, Or the black water of Pompitana stands. Dryden.

3. Throughout; in the whole: with all prefixed.

Silenus, all along in his Proverbs, gives the title of fool to a wicked man. Tickleton.

They were all along, a cross toward sort of people. Sedge.

4. Joined with the particle with; in company; joined with.
ALO

I your commission we, forthwith dispatch;
And be to England shall along with you.
Though then! and Evil go with thee along,
The offering, to the place of evil Hell. When religious zeal is subject to an excess, and to a defect; when something is mingled with it, which it should not have; or, when wanting something, that ought to go along with it. Sprat.

5. Sometimes with is understood.
Command thy slaves: my face-born soul disdains.
A tyrant's curst and restive breaks the reins.
Take this along; and no dispute shall rise
(Though mine the woman) but let my candid price.

Dryden.

6. Forward; onward. In this sense it is derived from allons, French.
Come then, my friend; my genius, come along, Thou master of the poet and the song!

Alo'of. ade. [all off, that is, quite off.]

1. At a distance; with the particle from.
It generally implies a small distance; such, as is within view or observation.

Shakespeare.
Then bade the knight thus holy yede aloof,
And to an hill herself withdraw aside;
From whence she might behold the baron's proof,
And else be safe from danger far described.

Fairy Queen.

As next in worth,
Came singly where he stood, on the bare strand;
While the promiscious crowd stood yet aloof.

Million's Paradise Lost.
The noise approaches; through our palace stood Aloof from streets, encompass'd with a wood.

Dryden.

2. Applied to persons; it often intimates caution and circumspection.
Turn on the bloody moulds, with heads of steel;
And make the cowards, stand aloof at bay.

Shakespeare.
Going northward aloof, as long as they had Any doubt of being pursu'd; at last, when they were cut off, resolved, they turned and crossed the ocean to Spain.

The king would not, by any means, enter the city, because the people of the grandees, that was the conversion of gramman, more than any other, now comprize in short hints; and a dictionary, alphabetically containing the words of the language, with the deaf person, is to be learned by each of the letters, or elements of speech.

Shakespeare.

Already, ade. [from all and readily.]
At this present time, or at some time past;
Opposed to finitude; as, Will he come soon? He is here already. Will it be done? It has been done already.

Touching our uniformity; that, which has been already answered, may serve for answer.

Hooker.

You warn'd me still, of loving two;
Can I love him, already living you?

Dryden's Fables.

Urbain's Galles.

3. In a figurative sense, it is used to import art or cunning in conversation, by which a man holds the principal question at a distance.
Nor do we find him forward to be sound;
But with a crafty madness keeps aloof.
Whereon sprang in him an unfeigned confession
Of his true state.

Shakespeare, Hamlet.

4. It is used metaphorically of persons, that will not be seen in a design.
It is never seen, the queen join; for, if she stand aloof, they will be still suspicious; it being a received opinion, that she hath a great interest in the king's favour and power.

Sacheting.

5. It is applicable to things, not properly belonging to each other.
Love's not love,
When it is mingled with regards, that stand
Aloof from the entire point.

Shakep. K. Lear.

ALO' D. ade. [from a and loud.] Loudly; with a strong voice; with a great noise.

Strangely he first! yet seems to cry aloud,
To warn the night the proud; that of the great, neglecting to be just.

Hallaer.

Then heaven's high monarch thunders rise aloof,
And thence he shook aloft a golden cloud.

Dryden.

Alo'of. ade. [from a and loud.] In a low place; not aloft.
And now aloft, and now aloft they fly,
As borne through air; and seem to touch the

Dryden.

I am alpha and omega, the beginning and the ending, with the Lord; which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty; Rev.

ALPHABET. n. s. [from alpha, and beta, the two first letters of the Greeks.] The order of the letters, or elements of speech.
Thou shalt not sigh,
Nor wink, nor nod, nor kneel, nor make a sign; but 1 of these will rest an alphabet.

And by still practice learn to know thy meaning.

Shakespeare.

The letters of the alphabet, formed by the several motions of the mouth; and the great variety of syllables, composed and formed with letters, almost equal velocity; and the endless number of words, capable of being framed out of the alphabet, either of more syllables or of one, are wonderful.

Hiller.

Taught by their nurses, little children get this saying, sooner than their alphabet.

To ALPHABET. v. a. [from alphabet, num.] To range in the order of the alphabet.

ALPHABETICAL. adj. [from alphabet; alphabetick. (alphabetique, Fr.) In the order of the alphabet; according to the series of letters.

ALS

Als suo. [from all and so.]
1. In the same manner; likewise.
In these two, no doubt, are contained the causes of the great decline; as according to Moses, so also according to necessity: for our world affords no other treasures of water.

Burnet's Theory.

2. Also is sometimes nearly the same with and, and only conjures the members of the sentence.
God do so to me, and more.

1. Samuel, xiv, 44.

ALTAR. n. s. [alterare, Lat. It is observed by Juvenal, that the word alter is received, with Christianity, in all the European languages; and that alterare is used by one of the Fathers, as appropriated to the Christian worship, in opposition to the area of gentilism.]

1. The place, where offerings to heaven are laid.
The goddess of the nuptial bed,
Tir'd with her vain devotions for the dead;
Recall'd the dinted hand should be repaid;
Which incense offer'd, and her altar held.

Dryden.

2. The table in Christian churches, where the communion is administered.

Her grace rose; and, with modest presence,
Came to the altar, where she kne'd, and saintedlike.

Cast her fair eyes to heaven, and pray'd devoutly.

Shakespeare.

ALTERAGE. n. s. [alterari-um, Lat.] An emolument, arising to the priest from oblations, through the means of the altar.

Augli's Parergon.

ALTAR CLOTH. n. s. [from alter and cloth.] The cloth, thrown over the altar in Churches.
I should set down the wealth, books, hangings, and altar-cloths which our kings gave this abbey.

Pococke on Drawing.

To ALTER. v. a. [alter, Fr. from alter, Lat.]
1. To change; to make otherwise than it is.
To alter seems more proper to imply a change, made only in some part of a thing; as, to alter a writing, may be, to blot or interpelate it; to change it, may be, to substitute another in its place.

With from and to; as, her face is altered from pale to red.

Do you note,
How much her grace is altered on the sudden?
How long her face is drawn? how pale she looks.
And of an earthly cold?

Shakespeare, Henry VIII.
Acts, a propitiated to the worship of God by his own appointment, must continue so, till himself hath otherwise declared: for, who dares alter, what God hath appointed?

Stillingfleet.

2. To take off, from a persuasion, practice, or sect.
For the way of writing plays in verse, I find it troublesome and slow; but I am no way altered, from my opinion of it; at least with any reasons, which have opposed it.

Dryden.

To ALTER, r. n. To become otherwise, then it was; as, the weather alters from bright to cloudy.

ALTERABLE. adj. [from alter; alterable, Fr.] That, which may be altered or changed by something else; distinct from changeable, or that, which changes, or may change itself.
That alterable respects are realities in nature, will never be admitted by a considerate Dis-\n count. Our condition in this world is mutable and un-\ncertain, alterable by a thousand accidents, which we can see or foresee, or prevent. I wish they had been more clear in their direc-\ntions upon that mighty point. Whether the settle-\nment of the succession in the House of Hanover be alterable, or not? Swift.

Alternableness. n. s. [from alterable.] The quality of being alterable, or admitting change from external causes. Alternably. adv. [from alterable.] In such a manner as may be altered.

Alterage. n. s. [from alter.] The breed-\ning, nourishing, or fostering of a child. In Ireland they put their children to fosterers: the rich self, the meaner sort buying the alterage of their children; and the reason is, because, in the opinion of the people, fostering has always been a stronger alliance than blood. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

Alterant. adj. [alterant, Fr.] That which has the power of producing changes in any thing. And whether the body be alterant or altered, evermore a perception precedent operation; for else all bodies would be alike one to another. Bacon.

Alteration. n. s. [from alter; alteration, Fr.] 1. The act of altering or changing. Alteration, though it be from worse to better, hath in it inconveniences, and those weights.

2. The change made. Why may we not presume, that God doth even call for such change or alteration, as the very condition of things doth make necessary? Hooker.

So be, with difficulty and labour hard, Mov'd on: But he once past, soon after, when man fell, Strange alteration Sin! and, in his death, undoes. Following his track, (such was the will of heav'n) Peace shall follow wide and hasten way. Milton. No other alteration will satisfy; nor this neither, very long, without an utter abolition of all order, South.

Appius Claudius admitted to the senate the sons of those who had been slaves; by which, and succeeding alterations, that council degenerate-\ned into a most corrupt body. Swift.

Alternative. adj. [from alter.] Medicines called alterative, are such as have no immediate sensible operation, but gradually gain upon the constitution, by changing the humours from a state of disordered temper to health. They are opposed to curatives. Quincy.

When there is an eruption of humour in any part, it is not cured merely by outward applications, but by such alterative medicines as purify the blood. Governor of the Tongue.

Alteration. n. s. [alteration, Fr. from alterer, Lat.] Debate; controversy; wrangle. By this hot pursuit of lower controversies amongst men professing religion, and agreeing in the principal foundations of Christianity, they extol hope, that, about the higher principles themselves, there will come alteration to grow. Hals. Their whole life was little else than a perpetual wrangling and alteration; and that, many times, rather for victory, and satisfaction of wit, than a sober and serious search of truth. Hakewill on Providence.

Alter'n. adj. [alterrus, Lat.] Acting by turns, in succession each to the other.
A M

We find not in the world any people that hath lived altogether without religion. Hooker.

And death and danger are things that really cannot be endured, nor would ever be obliged to suffer for his conscience, or do to his religion; it being altogether as absurd to imagine a man obliged to suffer, as to do impossibilities. Shaks.

I do not altogether disapprove of the manner of interweaving texts of scripture through the style of your sermon. Sengt.

2. Conjunctly, in company. This is rather all together.

Cousin of Somerset, join you with me, and altogether with the Duke of Suffolk, we'll quickly boist duke Humphrey from his seat.

St. Aude. n. s. [from a and latus; that is, without lute.]

A kind of mineral salt, of an acid taste, leaving in the mouth a sense of sweetness, accompanied with a considerable degree of astrignency. The ancient Romans divided all salts into two sorts of alum, natural and factitious. The natural alum is said to be obtained from the island of Milo, being a kind of whitish stone, very light, friable, and porous, and streaked with flannel-white. England, Italy, and Flanders, are the countries where alum is principally produced; and the English recha-alum is made up of a billunan or natural stone, in the hills of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire.

Searccharine alum is a composition of common alum, with ashes and whites of eggs boiled together, to the consistence of a paste, and thus moulded at pleasure. As it cools, it grows hard as a stone.

Burnt alum is alum calcined over the fire. Plutarch or phum alum is a sort of saline mineral stone, of various colours, most commonly white, bordered on green; it runs in threads or fibres, resembling those of a feather; whence its name from phum, a feather. Chambers. By the French name of a white of an egg, the French have obtained a lump of alum, you may bring it, for the most part, into white claws. Bogis.

Alum stone. A stone or calx used in surgery; perhaps alum calcined, which then becomes corrosive.

She gazed with oxen, and was in a few days cured, by touching it with vitriol and alum stones. Wiseman.

Aluminous. adj. [from alum.] Relating to alum, or consisting of alum.

Nor do we reasonably conclude, because, by a cold and aluminous moisture, it is able whilst to resist the fire, that, from a peculiarity of nature, it subsisteth and liveth in it.

Brown.

The murder may have other mixture with it, to make it of a vitriolic or aluminous nature. Wiseman's Surgery.

Always. adv. [It is sometimes written any, compounded of all and way; called piego, Sax. tuttiva, Ital.]

1. Perpetually; that which always, at all time: opposed to sometime, or to never.

That, which sometime is expedient, doth not always so continue. Hooker.

Man never is, but always is to be blest. Pope.

2. Constantly; without variation: opposed to sometimes, or to now and then.

He was so great a man, when some great occasion is presented to him. Dryden.

M. n. Stands for arthrum magister, or master of arts; the second degree of our universities, which, in some foreign countries is called doctor of philosophy.

AM

The first person of the verb to be.

[See To Be.]

And God said unto Moses, I am that I am: and he said, shall I say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you. Exod. iii, 14.

Come then, my soul; I call thee by that name, Thou bane boy thing, from whence I know I am.

For knowing that I am, I know thou art;

Since that must needs exist, which can impart, Prior.

AMABILITY. n. s. [from amabilis, Lat.]

Loveliness; the power of pleasing.

No rules can make amability, our minds and apprehensions make that; and so is our felicity. Taylor.

AMADETTO. n. s. A sort of pear.

[See Pear] so called, says Skinner, from the name of him who cultivated it.

AMADOT. n. s. A sort of pear. [See Pear.]

AMAIN. adv. [from maine, or maige, old Fr. derived from magnus, Lat.] With vehemence; with vigour; fiercely; violently.

It is used of any action performed with precipitation, whether of fear or courage, or of any violent effort.

Great lords, from Ireland am I come.

To signify that rebels there are up. Shakes.

What? What! to what we fled amain, pursued, and struck. With hea'm nor afflicting thunder, and beard amain. Milton.

The deep to shelter us. Milton.

The hills, to their supply, Vapour and exhalation, dust and moist, Sent amain up. Milton.

From hence the bow was rouser'd, and sprung amain.

Like light'nning sudden, on the warrian train, Beats down the trees before him, shakes the ground.

The forest echoes to the cracking sound, Shout the fierce youth, and clamours ring around, Dryden.

AMALGAM. n. s. [am and ymag.] AMALGAMA.} The mixture of metals procured by amalgamation. See AMALGAMATION.

The introduction of the amalgam appears to proceed from the new texture resulting from the collision of the mingled ingredients, that make up the amalgam.

To AMALGAMATE. v. a. [from amalgam.] To unite metals with quicksilver, which may be practised upon all metals, except iron and copper. The use of this operation is, to make the metal soft and ductile. Gold is, by this method, drawn over other materials by the gilders.

AMALGAMATION. n. s. [from amalgamate.]

The act or practice of amalgamating metals.

AMALGAMATION is the mixing of mercury with any of the metals. The manner is thus in gold, the rest are answerable: Take six parts of mercury, mix them hot in a crocodile, and pour them to one part of gold made red hot in another crocodile; stir these well, that they may incorporate; then cast the mass into cold water, and wash it.

AMARANTH. 2. The long pendulous amaranth, with reddish coloured seeds, commonly called Love lies a bleeding.

In poetry, it is sometimes an imaginary flower, supposed, according to its name, never to die. Immortal amaranth! a flower which once in paradise, fast by the tree of life,

Began to bloom; but soon, for man's offence,

To heaven remov'd, where first it grew, there grows,

And flourishes aloft, shedding the fount of life; And where the river of liss, thou midst of heavn,

Rows o'er Elysian flow'rs; her amber stream:

With these, that never fail, the spirits elate Bind their resplendent locks, in weareth'd with beams.

AMARANTHINE. adj. [amaranthinus, Lat.] Relating to amaranths; consisting of amaranths.

By the streams that ever flow,

By the fragrant winds that blow

Of the Elysian flow'rs;

By those happy souls that dwell

In yellow needs of asphodel,

Or amaranthine bow'rs.

AMARANTHUS. n. s. [amaranthus, Lat.]

Bitterness.

What amaranth or acrimony is depredated in choler, it acquires from a compositure of melancholy, or external malign bodies. Harvey on Consumptions.

AMARULENCE. n. s. [amarulentus, Lat.]

Bitterness.

AMASMENT. n. s. [from amass.] A heap; an accumulation; a collection.

What is now, is but an amasment of imaginary conceptions, prejudices, ungrounded opinions, and infinite impostures. Glanville's Sequel Sententiae.

To AMASS. v. a. [amass, Fr.]

1. To collect together in one heap or mass.

The rich man is not blazoned, as having made use of any unlawful means to amass riches, as having striven by fraud and injustice. Atterbury's Sermon. When we would think of infinite space, or duration, we, at first step, usually make some very large idea, as perhaps of millions of ages, or miles, which possibly we doubt, or err in several times. All that we thus amass together in our thoughts, is positive, and the amasment of a great number of positive ideas of space or duration, Locke.

2. In a figurative sense, to add one thing to another, generally with some share of reproach, either of eagerness or indiscretion.

Such as amass all relations, must err in some, and be unbelieved in many. Brown's Pal. Err.

Do not content yourselves with mere words, lest your improvements only amass a heap of unintelligible phrases. Wotton's Imper. of the Mind.

The life of Honour has been written, by amas-

AMATEUR, adj. [amatorius, Lat.]

A little insignificant lover; a pretender to affection.

AMATORIUS, n. s. [amatorius, Lat.]

Relating to love or causing love.

It is the same thing whether one avows Lucrezia by force, as Tarquin, or by amatory potions not only to allure her, but necessitate her to satisfy his lust, and force her, effectually, and draw her, inventive, to follow him spontaneously.

AMAUROSIS. n. s. [aumacptic.]

A dimness of sight, not from any visible defect in the eyes, but from some distemper of the inner parts, occasioning the representations of flies and dust floating before the eyes: which appearances are the parts of the retina hid and compressed by the blood-vessels being too much distended; so that, in many of its parts, all sense is lost, and therefore no images can be painted upon them; whereby the eyes continually rolling round, many parts of objects falling successively upon them, are obscure. The cure of this depends upon a removal of the stagnations in the extremities of those arteries which run over the bottom of the eye. Quincy. To AMAZE. v. a. [from amaze, perplexity.]

1. To confound with terror.

Yea, I will make many people amaze thee, and their kings shall be horribly afraid for thee, when I shall brandish my sword before them, and they shall tremble at every moment; every man for his own life in the day of the Ecke! Ezekiel.

2. To put into confusion with wonder.

Go, heavy pair, and with your dazzling virtues,

Your courage, truth, your innocence and love,

Amaze and charm mankind.

Smith.

3. To put into perplexity.

That cannot amaze me. Him he be not amaze, he will be mocked; if he be amaze, he will every way be mocked.

Shakesp.

AMAZE. n. s. [from the verb amaze.] Astonishment; confusion, either of fear or wonder.

Fairfax, whose name in arms thro' Europe rings, And fills all mouths with envy or with praise, And all her jealous monarchs with amaze. Milton.

Meantime the Trojan cuts his wary way, Fix'd on his voyage, through the eurin sea; Then cast the ships back with his fire amaze. See the Punic Wars the mounting blaze. Dry.

AMAZEDLY. adv. [from amazed.] Confusely; with amazement; with confusion.

I speak amazedly, and it becomes

My marvel, and my message.

Shakesp.

But why?

Stands Macbeth thus amazed?

Come, sisters, cheer we up his spirits. Shakesp.

AMAZEDNESS. n. s. [from amazed.] The state of being amazed; astonishment; wonder; confusion.

I was by at the opening of the farthel, heard the old shepherd deliver the manner how he found it; whereupon, after a little amazened, we were all compounded out of the chamber. Shakesp.

AMAZEMENT. n. s. [from amaze.]

1. Such a confused apprehension as does not leave reason its full force; extreme fear; horror.

He answer'd nought at all; but adding new fear to his first astonishment, saying wide, With stony eyes, and heartless hollow hue, Astonish'd stood, as one that had esp'd infernal forces, with their chains us'd. Fairy Q.

But look! amazement on thy mother sits; O step between her and her fighting soul; Correct in weakest bodies strongest works. Shak.

2. Extreme dejection.

He ended, and his words impression left Of much amazement to th' infernal crew, Distressed, and surpris'd with deep dismay. At these and thinking Milton.

3. Height of admiration.

Had you, some ages past, this race of glory Run, with amazement we should read your story; But living vice, and dust, and bubbles, to. Meets every stair to grapple with at last. Waller.

4. Astonishment; wonder at an unexpected event.

They knew that it was he which sat for alms at the beautiful Gate of the temple, and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that which had happened unto him. Acts.

AMAZING. particular adj. [from amaze.]

Wonderful; astonishing.

It is an amazing thing to see the present desolation of Italy, when one considers what incredible multitudes it abounded with during the reigns of the Roman Emperors. Add.

AMAZINGLY. adv. [from amazing.] To a degree that may excite astonishment; wonderfully.

If we were one to the world, our knowledge of them must be amusingly imperfect, when we have not the least grain of sand, and has too many difficulties belonging to it for the wisest philosopher to answer. [W. Logick.]

AMAZON. n. s. and adj. The most valorous race of women famous for valour, who inhabited Caucasus; they are so called from their cutting off their breasts, to use their weapons better.

A warlike woman; a virago.

Stay, stay thy hands, thou art an amazon,

And fightest with the sword. Shakesp.

AMBAGES. n. s. [Lat.]

A circuit of words; a circumentatory form of speech; a multiplicity of words; an indirect manner of speech.

They gave those complex ideas names, that they might more easily record and discourse of things they were daily conversant in, without long anges and abbreviations, and that they might not be one to give and receive information about, might be the easier and quicker understood. Locke.

AMBAGIOUS. adj. [from ambages.] Circumentatory; perplexed; tedious. Dict.

AMBAS'ADE. n. s. [ambassade, Fr.] Embassay; character or business of an ambassador: a word not now in use.

When you disgrace me in my ambassade.

Then I degraded you from being king. Shakesp.

AMBASSADO'REN. n. s. [ambassador, Fr. embassador, Spain. It is written differently, as it is supposed to come from the French or Spanish language; and the original derivation being uncertain, it is not easy to settle its orthography.

Some derive it from the Hebrew 'nu to tell, and 'nu messenger; others from ambactus, which in the old Gaulish, signified a servant; whence ambass, in low Latin, is found to signify service, and ambassiator, a servant; others deduce it from ambacht, in old Teutonic, signifying a government; and Jenus mentions a possibility of its descent from ambas; and others from ama for ad, and busus, from, as supposing the act of sending an ambassadour, to be in some sort an act of submission. All these derivations lead to write ambassadour, not ambassadour.] A person sent in a public manner from one sovereign power to another, and supposed to represent the power from which he is sent.

The person of an ambassadour is inviolable.

Ambassadour, in popular language, the general name of a messenger from a sovereign power, and sometimes ludicrously, from common persons. In the juridical and formal language, it signifies particularly a minister of the highest rank residing in another country, and is distinguished from an envoy, who is of less dignity.

Give first adulation to th' ambassadour. Shak. England, by these importunities, can hardly impose. Nor ask your love, nor did your faith implore. But come without a pledge, my own ambassadour. Dry.

Oft have their black ambassadours appeared Loaden with gifts, and fill'd the courts of Lunn.

AMBASSADRESS. n. s. [ambassadricr, Fr.]

1. The lady of an ambassadour.

2. In ludicrous language, a woman sent on a message.

When my ambassadress—

Come you to menace war, and loud defiance? Or does the peaceful olive grace your brow Rowe. A.

AMBASSADOREN. n. s. [from ambr, Arab. whence the lower writers formed ambaram.] A yellow transparent substance of a gaudious or bumble本质 consisting of something solid and a smell like oil of turpentine; chiefly found in the Baltic sea, along the coasts of Prussia. Some naturalists refer it to the earth, others to the mineral, and some even to the animal kingdom. Pliny describes it as a resOLUTE juice, oozing from aged piles and fissures, and discolored the rivers into the sea. He adds, that it was the ancients gave it the denomination of succinum, from succus, juice. Some have imagined it a concretion of the tears of birds; others, the urine of a beast; others, the scum of the lake Cephina, near the Antick; others, a concretion formed in the Baltic, and in some fountains, where it is found swimming like pitch. Others suppose it a bitumen trickling into the sea from subterraneous sources: but this opinion is also discarded, as good amber having been found in digging at considerable distance from the sea, as that gathered on the coast. Hock now ranges it with naphtha, which is a concrete oil of aromatic plants, elaborated by heat into a crystalline form. Within some pieces of amber have been found leaves and insects included; which seems to indicate, either that the amber was originally in a fluid state, or that, having been exposed to the sun, it was softened, and rendered part of the leaves and insects. Amber, when rubbed, draws or attracts bodies to it; and, by friction, is brought to yield light pretty copiously in this dark. Some distinguish amber into yellow, white, black and brown; but the two latter are supposed to be of a different nature and denomination, the one called jelly, the other amber.

Dry. Chambers.

Liquid amber is a kind of native balsam or resin, as turpentine; clear, reddish, or yellowish; of Newton's Opticks.

The ambient ether is too liquid and empty, to impel horizontally with that prodigious celerity.

Beaum.

Ambigu. n.s. [French.]

An entertainment, consisting not of regular courses, but of a medley of dishes set on together.

When strained'd in your time, and servants few,

You'd richly then compose an ambigu;

Where first and second course, and your dessert,

All in one single table have set on together.

King's Art of Cookery.

Ambiguity. n.s. [from ambiguous.]

Doubtfulness of meaning; uncertainty of signification; double meaning.

With ambiguities they often entangle themselves, not marking what duty agree to the word of God in itself, and what in regard of outward accidents.

Hooker.

We can clear these ambiguities,

And know their spring; their head, their true descent.

Shakespeare.

The words are of single signification, without any ambiguity; and therefore I shall not trouble you, by straining for an interpretation, where there is no difficulty; but distinction, where there is no difference.

South.

Ambiguous. adj. [ambigus, Lat.]

1. Doubtful; having two meanings; of uncertain signification.

But what have been thy answers, what but dark, ambiguous, and with doubtful sense deluding?

Milton.

Some expressions in the covenant were ambiguous, and were left so; because the persons who framed them were not all of one mind.

Clarendon.

2. Applied to persons using doubtful expressions. It is applied to expressions, or those that use them, not to a dubious or suspended state of mind.

Brown.

Amenable. n.s. [They seem to come from amen, Fr.] Conduct; behaviour; mien; words disused. For he is fit to be a sure assenity. Whether for arms and warfare amencn, Or else for wise and civil governance. Spenser.

Th' enchanter, by his arms and amencn, When under him he saw his Lybian steed to dance. Fairy Queen.

To Amend. v. a. [amender, Fr. enuider, Lat.]
1. To correct; to change any thing that is wrong to something better.
2. To reform the life, or leave wickedness.

In these two cases we usually write mend. See MEND.
Amend your ways and your doings, and I will come to you to dwell in this place. Jer. viii. 3. Rev.

3. To restore passages in writers, which the copiers are supposed to have depraved; to recover the true reading.

To Amend, v. n. To grow better. To amend differs from to improve; to improve supposes or not denies that the thing is already bad, but to amend promises something good.

As my fortune either amends or impairs, I may declare it unto you. Sidney.

At his touch.

Such sanctity hath heaven given his hand, They presently amend. Shakesp. Macbeth.

AMENDE. n.s. [French.] This word, in French, signifies a fine, by which recompense is supposed to be made for the fault committed. We use it, in a cognate signification, the word amends.

AMENDEMENT. n.s. [amendment, Fr.] A change from bad for the better.
Before it was presented on the stage, some things in it had passed your approbation of amendment. Dryden.
Men are always mending and altering his works; but nature observes the same manner, because her works are so perfect, that there is no place for amendments; nothing that can be reprehended. Bayley on Creation.

There are many natural defects in the understanding, capable of amendment, which are overlooked, and wholly neglected. Locke.

2. Reformation of life.

Our Lord spake to the Lord God of opHon, of those persons, which they would not be agreed to amend upon of life, by the testimony which Moses and the prophets have given, concerning the miseries that follow sinners that are not likely to be persuaded by other means, although God from the dead should have raised them up preachers. Hooker.

Behold! famine and plague, tribulation and anguish, are sent as scourges for amendment.

Though a serious purpose of amendment, and true acts of contrition, before the habit, may be accepted by God; yet there is no sure judgment where this purpose he serious, or these acts true acts of contrition, Hammond's Proct. Catechism.

Your honour's players, hearing your amendment, Are come to play a pleasant comedy. Shakesp.

AMENDMENT. n.s. [amendatio, Lat.] It signifies, in law, the correction of an error committed in a process, and esied before or after judgment; and sometimes after the party's seeking advantage by the error.

Blount.

Amender. n.s. [from amend.] The person that amends any thing.

Amends. n.s. [amende, Fr. from which it seems to be accidentally corrupted.] Recompense; compensation; atonement.
If I have too hastily punished you, Your compensation makes amends. Shakesp.
Of the amends recovered, little or nothing returns to those parties that had suffered the wrong, but commonly all runs into the prince's coffers. Raleigh's Fneas.

There I, a pris'ner chains'd, scarce freely drew The air imprisoned also, close and damp; Unwholesome draught; but here I feel amends, The breath of heav'n's fresh blowing, pure and sweet.

With day-spring born; here leave me to restore. Milton.

Some little hopes I have yet remaining, that I may make the world some part of amends for many ill plays, by an heroicke poem. Dryden.

E'en souls be immortal, this makes abundant amends and compensation for the frailties of life, and sufferings of this state. Tillotson.

It is a strong argument for retribution hereafter, that virtuous persons are very often unfortunate, and vicious persons prosperous; which is repugnant to the nature of a Being, who appears infinitely wise and good in all his works; unless we may suppose that such a promiscuous distribution, which was necessary for carrying on the design of providence in this life, will be rectified and made amends for in another. Spectator.

AMENITY. n.s. [amenité, Fr. amanitaats, Lat.] Pleasance; agreeableness of situation.
If the situation of Babylon was such at first as in the days of Herodotus, it was a seat of amenity and pleasure. Brown.

AMERICAN. adj. [amentatus, Lat.] Hanging as by a thread.
The pine tree hath amencnious flowers or katkins. Miller.

To AME'RICER. v. a. [americer, Fr. o'pprèwer par dra'vans, seems to give the original.

1. To punish with a pecuniary penalty; to exact a fine; to inflict a forfeiture. It is a word originally juridical, but adopted by other writers, and is used by Spenser of punishments in general.

We are every one that misseth then her make, Shall be by him amerc'd with pensee due, Spenser.
But I'll amerce you with so strong a fine, That you shall all repent the loss of mine. Shak.
All the sinners were considerably amerc'd; yet this proved but an ineffectual remedy for those miscarriages. Hales.

AMETHOICAL. adj. [from a and method.] Out of method; without method; irregular.

AMETHYST. n.s. [ynthet, contrary to wine, or contrary to drunkenness: so called, either because it is not quite of the colour of wine, or because it was imagined to prevent inebriation.]
A precious stone of a violet colour, bordering on purple. The oriental amethyst is the hardest, and most valuable of all; it is generally of a deep colour, though some are purple, and others white like the diamond. The German is of a violet colour, and the Spanish are of three sorts; the best are the blackest or deepest violet; others are almost quite white, and some few tinted with yellow. The amethyst is not extremely hard, but may be engraved upon, and set in any value to the emerald. Savory. Chambers.

Some stones approached the granate complexion; and several nearly resembled the amethyst. Woodward.

Amethyst. [in heraldry] signifies the same colour in a nobleman's coat, that purpure does in a gentleman's.

AMETHYSTINE. adj. [from amethyst.] Resembling an amethyst in colour.

A kind of amethystine tint, not composed of crystals or grains, but one entire massy stone. Cree.

AMIABLE. adj. [aimable, Fr.]
1. Lovely; pleasing.

That which is good in the actions of men, doth not only delight as profitable, but as amiable also. Hooker.

She told her, while she kept it,
'Twould make her lovelier, subdue her father Entirely to her love; but if she lost it, Or made a gift of it, my father's eye Should hold her loathed. Shakesp. Othello.

2. Pretending love; shewing love.
Lay amiable wife to the honesty of this Ford's wife; use your art of wooing. Shakesp.
AMI

AMABLENESS. n.s. [from amiable] The quality of being amiable; lovableness; power of raising love. As soon as the natural gayety and amiableness of the young men wears off, they have nothing left to recommend them, but lie among the lumber and refuse of the species. Addison.

AMABLY. adv. [from amiable.] In an amiable manner; in such a manner as to excite love.

AMICABLE. adj. [amicabilis, Lat.] Friendly; kind. It is commonly used of more than one; as, they live in an amicable manner; but we s-blown say, an amicable action, or an amicable man, though it be so used in this passage.

O grace sweet! oh virtue heavenly far! Divine oblation of low-thoughted cure! Fresh blooming hope, gay daughter of the sky! And faith, our early immortality! Enter each ould, each amiable guest. Receive and wrap me in eternal rest. Pope.

AMICABILITY. n.s. [from amicable.] The quality of being amiable; friendliness; good-will.

AMICALLY. adv. [from amiable.] In an amicable manner; in a friendly way; with goodwill and civility. They see Through the dan mist, in blooming heath fresh, Two lovely yachts, that amicably walk. O’er verdant fields, and pleasant seas, perhaps, revolv’d Anna’s late conquests. Philips.

I found my subjects amicably join To lessen their defects, by cing mine. Prior.

In Holland itself, where it is pretended that the variety of sects live so amicably together, it is notorious how the humblest sect, joined with the Arminians, did attempt to destroy the republic. Swift’s Church of England Man.

AMICE. n.s. [amicus, Lat. amict, Fr. Primum ex sex induentibus episcopo et presbyteris communibus sunt, amicus, alba, albobrum, stola, manipulus, et planula. Du Cange. Amicis quo collum strigilis, et pectus tegitam, constitutam interioris hominis designant: tegit exorc, ne vanitates cognit: stringat autem collum, ne inde ad linguam transeat meandrum. Bruno.] The first or undermost part of a priest’s habit, over which he wears the albs. Thus pass’d the night so foul, till morning fair Came forth with pilgrim steps in amice grey. Milton.

On some a priest, succinct in amice white, Attends. Pope.

AMID. prep. [from amid or midst]

1. In the midst; equally distant from either extremity: Of the fruit Of each tree in the garden we may eat; But of the fruit of this fair tree amist. The garden, God hath said, ye shall not eat. Milton.

The two ports, the bagno, and Donatelli’s statue of the great duke, amidst the four sires, claimed to his pedestal, are very noble sights. Addison.

So falls amid the air encounter’d hills, Hurl’d to and fro with jactation dire. Milton.

What have I done, to name that wealthy swain, the hoar amidst my crystal streams I bring, And southern winds to blast my flow’ry spring. Dryden.

Amata’s breast the fury thus invades, And fires with rage amidst the sylvan shades. Dryden.

3. Amongst; conjoined with: What tho’ no real voice nor sound Amid their radiant orbs be found? In reason’s ear they all rejoice, And witness forth a glorious voice, For ever singing, as they shine, “The hand that made us is divine.” Addison.

Amiss. adv. [from a, which, in this form, of composition, often signifies according to, and miss, the English particle, which shows any thing, like the Greek se, to be wrong; as, to misconstrue, to count erroneously; to misdo, to commit a crime: amiss therefore signifies not right, or out of order.]

1. Faulty; criminal: For that thou hast sworn to do amiss, Is yet amiss, when it is truly done. Shakesp. King John.

2. Faultily; criminally: We hope therefore to reform ourselves, if at any time we have done amiss, not to suffer ourselves from the change of times, to be either submitted to, or to submit ourselves. Hooker.

O ye powers that search, The heart of man, and weigh his honest thoughts, If I have done amiss, impute it not. Addison.

3. In an ill sense: She sigh’d within, they constr’d all amiss. And thought she wish’d to kill who long’d to kiss. Pope.

4. Wrong; improper; unfit: Examples have generally not the force of laws, which all men ought to keep, both of conveniences and of opinions, not amiss to be followed by them, whose case is the like. Hooker.

Methinks, though a man had science, and all principles, yet it might not be amiss to have some conscience. Tillotson.

5. Wrong; not according to the perfection of the thing, whatever it be. Your kindred is not much amiss, ’tis true: Yet I am somewhat better born than you. Dryd.

I built was when the monarch’s mind the knaves, nothing delighted me so much as to stand by, while my servants throw down what was amiss. Swift.

6. Reproachful; irreverent: Every people, nation, and language, which speaks amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a furnace; because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort. Dan. iii. 29.

Impaired in health; as, I was somewhat amiss yesterday, but am well to-day.

Amis is marked as an adverb, though it cannot always be adverbially rendered; because it always follows the substantive to which it relates, contrary to the nature of adjectives in English; and though we say the action was amis, we never say an amis action.

9. Amis is used by Shakespeare as a noun substantive: To my sick soul, as sin’s true nature is, Each toy seems prologue to some great amis. Hamlet.

AMISS. prep. [from amissus, Lat.] Loss. To AMIT. v. a. [amitio, Lat.] To lose a word little in use.

AMO

The voice of God they heard,
Now walking in a garden, by soft winds
Brought to their ears, while day declin’d they heard,
And from his presence hid themselves, among
The thickest trees, both man and wife. Milton.

2. Conjoined with others, so as to make part of the number.
I have then, as you see, observed the failings of many great men, amongst the moderns, who have attempted to write an epic poem Dryden.

There were, among the old Roman statues, several of Venus in different postures and habits; as there are many particular figures of her made after the same design. Addison.

AMORIST. n. s. [from amor.]
An amorous; a gallant; a man professing love.

Female beauties are as sickle in their faces as their minds, though cautious should spare them, age brings in a necessity of decay; leaving doters upon red and white perplexed by uncertainty both of the continuance of their mistress’s kind-and her beauty, both which are necessary to the amorous’s joys and quiet. Hogge.

AMOROSO. n. s. [Ital.] A man enamoured.

AMOROUS. adj. amoroso, Ital.]
1. In love; enamoured; with the particle of before the thing loved; In Shakespeare, or.
Sure my brother is amorous on Her; and hath withdrawn her father to break with him about it, Shakesp.

The amorous master own’d her potent eyes,
Sigh’d when he look’d; and trembled as he drew;
Each flowing line confirms his first surprise,
And as the piece advance’d, the passion grew. Prior.

2. Naturally inclined to love; disposed to fondness, fond;
As upon which they have brought forth their youth, keep their eyes fastened on them, and are never weary of admiring their beauty; so amorous is nature of whatsoever she produces. Dryden’s Davenancy.

3. Relating, or belonging to love,
I that am not shap’d for sportive tricks,
Nor made to court an amorous looking-glass,
Shakespeare, Rich. III.

And into all things from her air impr’d
The spirit of love, and amorous delight. Milton.

AMOROSÂlis. adv. [from amorous, one.] First caught they look’d; and each his liking chose. Milton.

O! how I long my careless limbs to lay
Under the plantain’s shade, and all the day
With amorous airs my fancy entertain,
Invoke the muses, and improve my vein! Waller.

Fondly, lovingly.
When thou wilt swim in that live-bath,
Each lish, which every channel hath,
Wild amorous to thee sworn,
Gladder to catch thee, than thou him. Donne.

AMOROUSNESS. n. s. [from amorous.
The quality of being amorous; fondness; loving; love.
All Glycine’s actions were interpreted by Basius,
As proceeding from jealousy of his amorousness. Solon.

Lindamur has wit, and amorousness enough to make him think it may be of use to defend his ladies, instead of defending himself against them. Bagelum Cole.

AMOR. adv. [a mort, Fr.] In the state of the dead; dejected; depressed; spiritless;
How fares my Kate? what, sweeting, all amortal?
Shakespeare, Tempest.

AMORTIZATION. n. s. [amortissement, Amortizement.] The right or act of discharging lands to mortmain; that is, to some community, that never is to cease.
Every one of the religious orders was confirmed by our predecessors; and they made an especial provision for them, after the laws of amortization were devised and put in use by princes.

To AMORTIZE. n. a. [amorizo, L.] To alienate lands or tenements to any corporation, guild, or fraternity, and their successors; which cannot be done without licence of the king, and the lord of the manour.
Bentley.

This did concern the kingdom, to have forms sufficient to maintain an able body out of penury, and to amortize the lands into the use of the inhabitants, or middle part of the people. Bacon.

To AMOURE. v. a. [amore, Lat.]
1. To remove from a post or station: a juridical sense.
2. To remove; to move; to alter: a sense now out of use.

Therewith, envenomed from his sober mood, And lives heyet, said he, that wrought this act? And do the heavens afford him vital food? Fair Quean.

At her sweet piteous cry was much amoured,
Her champion stout. Fair Quean.

To AMOUNT. v. n. [monter, Fr.]
1. To rise to in the accumulative quantity; to compose in the whole; with the particle to. It is used of several sums in quantities added together.
Let us compute a little more particularly how much this will amount to, or how many oceans of water would be necessary to compose this great ocean flowing in the air, without wind or banks. Barnett’s Theory.

2. It is used, figuratively, of the consequence rising from any thing taken altogether.
The errors of young men are the ruin of business; but the errors of aged men amount to this, that more might have been done, or sooner. Bacon.

Judgments that are made on the wrong side of the danger, amount to no more than an affectation of skill, without either credit or effect. L’Estrange.

AMOUNT. n. s. [from To amount.] The sum total; the result of several sums or quantities accumulated.
And now, ye lovers of life,
Where are you now, and what is your amount? Vexation, disappointment, and remorse, Thomas.

AMOUR. n. s. [amour, Fr., amor, Lat.] An affair of gallantry; an intrigue; generally used of vittious love. The eu sounds like oo in poor.
No man is so general and diffusive a last, as to procure his amor’s all the world over; and let it burn never so outrageously, yet the impure flame will either die of itself, or consume the body that harbours it. Spenser.

The restless youth search’d all the world around; but how can Love in his amours be found? Addison.

AMPER. n. s. [ampere, Sax.] A tumour, with inflammation; bile: a word said, by Skinner, to be much in use in Essex; but, perhaps, not found in books.

AMPHIBIOUS. adj. [a bath, and a wave.]
1. That which partakes of two natures, so as to live in two elements; as, in air and water.
A creature of amphibious nature,
On land a beast, a fish in water. Hudibras.

Those are called amphibious, which live freely in the air, upon the earth, and yet are observed to live long upon water, as if they were natural inhabitants of that element; though it be worth the examination to know, whether any of these creatures live at sea, and by choice, a good while, or at any time, upon the earth, can live a long time together, perfectly well under water. Lache.

Fishers contain much drudgery, and amphibious animals participate somewhat of the nature of fishes, and are ugly.

2. Of a mixt nature, in allusion to animals that live in air and water.

Troutes, and amphibious, Moloty fruit of mingled seed; By the dam from fordings sprung, Swift.

AMPHIBIOUS. n. s. [from amphibious.] The quality of being able to live in different elements.

AMPHIBOLOGICAL. adj. [from amphibology.] Doubtful.

AMPHIBOLOGICAL. adv. [from amphibological.] Doubtfully; with a doubtful meaning.

AMPHIBOLOGY. n. s. [amфибология.] Discourse of uncertain meaning. It is distinguished from equivocation, which means the double signification of a single word; and the speech of accident, in which every word is equivocal, is amphibology; capture lepores, meaning by lepore, either hares or jests, is equivocation.

Now the fallacies, whereby men deceive others, and are deceived themselves, the ancients have divided into verbal and real; of the verbal, and such as conclude from mistakes of the word, there are but two worthy our notice; the falsity of equivocation, and amphibology.

Bacon.

He that affirm'd, against sense, snow black to be, Might prove it by this amphibology; Things are not what they seem.

In defining obvious appearances, we are to use what is most plain and easy; that the mind be not nisled by amphibologies into falacious deductions.

General.

AMPHIPODUS. adj. [αμφιπόδος and βάτον.] Tossed from one to another; striking each way.

Never was there such an amphibulous quarrel both parties declaring themselves for the king and making use of his name in all their remonstrances, as defied Elyot.

AMPHILOGY. n. s. [αμφιλογία.] Equivocation; ambiguity.

Dict.

AMPHIFISIUM n. s. [Lat. αμφιφισιώ.] An amphibious serpent supposed to have two heads, and by consequence to move with either end foremost.

That the amphibious, that is, a smaller kind of serpent, which moveth forward and backward both hands, or that at either extreme, was affirmed by Nicander, and others.

Bacon.

Scorpion, and asp, and amphibian dire. Milton.

AMPHIPSYCH. n. s. [Lat. αμφίψυχος, of αμφί and ψυχή, a shadow.] Those people dwelling in climates, wherein the shadows, at different times of the year, fall both ways; to the north pole, when the sun is in the southern signs; and to the south pole, when he is in the northern signs. These are the people who inhabit the torrid zone.

AMPHITEATRE. n. s. [αμφίθεατρον, of αμφί and θέατρον.] A building in a circular or oval form, having its area encompassed with rows of seats one above another; where spectators might behold spectacles, as stage plays, or gladiators. The theatres of the ancients were built in the form of a semicircle, only exceeding a just semicircle by one-fourth part of the diameter; and the amphitheatre is two theatres joined together; so that the longest diameter of the amphitheatre was to the shortest, as one and a half to one. By the same reason, Shakespeare's man largeness in Liberal but whence a Swift. South. 73 that To he To stretched. Addison._

HOLDER.

To AMPLIFICATION. n. s. [amplification, Fr. amplification, Lat.] 1. Enlargement; extension.

2. It is usually taken in a rhetorical sense, and implies exaggerated representation, or diffuse narrative; an image heightened beyond reality; a narrative enlarged with many circumstances. I shall summarily, without any amplification at all, shew in what manner defects have been supplied.

Things unknown seem greater than they are, and are usually received with amplifications above their real value. Bacon.

Is the poet justifiable for relating such incredible amphibios鲱? It may be answered, if he had put these extravagances into the mouth of Ulysses, he had been unpardonable; but they suit well the character of Alcinoos. Pope.

AMPLIFIER. n. s. [from To amplify.] One that enlarges any thing; one that exaggerates; one that represents any thing with a large display of the best circumstances; it is usually taken in a good sense.

Dorifolus could not add amplifier's mouth for the highest point of praise. Sidney.

To AMPLIFY. v. t. [amplifier, Fr.] 1. To enlarge; to increase any material substance, or object of sense. Since a great moneyed magnate divided his chest, and coins, and bars, he seemed to himself richer than he was; and therefore a way to amplify any thing, is to break it, and to make anatomy of it in several parts, and to examine it according to the several circumstances. Bacon.

All concaves that proceed from more narrow to more broad, do amplify the sound at the going out. Bacon.

2. To enlarge, or extend any thing incorporeal.

As the repetition of the Roman prelates grew up in these blind ages, so grew up in them with a desire of amplifying their power, that they might be as great in temporal forces, as men's opinions have formed them in spiritual matters. Raleigh.

3. To exaggerate any thing; to enlarge it by the manner of representation.

Thy general is my lover; I have been

The book of his good acts; whence men have read His amplest parallel'd, his amplest amplified. Shakespeare.

I feel advantage of my health is insufficient to increase and amplify these remarks, to confirm and improve these rules, and to illuminate the several passages. Watts's Legh.

To AMPLIFY. v. t. Frequently with the particle on.

1. To speak largely in many words; to lay one's self out in diffusion.

When you affect to amplify on the former branches of a discourse, you will often lay a necessity upon yourself of correcting the latter, and prevent yourself in the most important part of your design, Watts's Legh.

2. To form large or pompous representations.

An excellent medicine for the stone might be conceived, by amplifying apprehensions able to break a diamond, to load a Brown. I have sometimes been forced to amplify on others; but here, where the subject is so fruitful,
AMP

that the harvest overcomes the reaper, I am short enied by my chain.
Homer amply, not invents; and as there was really a people called Cyclopes, so they might be men of great stature, or giants. Pope's Odyssey.

AMPLITUDE n.s. [amplitude, Fr. am-pli- tude, Lat.]

1. Extent.
Whatever I look upon, within the amplitude of heaven and earth, is evidence of human ignorance. Glasserie.

2. Largeness; greatness.
Men should learn how severe a thing the true inquisition of nature is, and accustom themselves, by the necessity of their case, to enlarge their conception of the amplitude of the world, and not reduce the world to the narrowness of their minds. Bacon.

3. Capacity; extent of intellectual faculties.
With more than human gifts from heav'n adorn'd; Perfections absolute, grace divine.
And amplitude of mind called northern.
Milton.

4. Splendour; grandeur; dignity.
In the great frame of kingdoms and commonwealths, it is in the power of princes, or states, to add amplitude and greatness to their kings.' Bacon's Essays.

5. Copiousness; abundance.
You should say every thing which has a proper meaning, and apply it to the subject at hand;
always proportioning the amplitude of your matter, and the fulness of your discourse, to your great design; the length of your time, to the convenience of your hearers. Wattis's Logick.

6. Amplitude of the range of a projectile, denotes the horizontal line subtending the path in which it moved.

7. Amplitude, in astronomy, an arch of the horizon, intercepted between the true east and west point thereof, and the centre of the sun or star at its rising or setting. It is eastern or orte, when the star rises; and western or occident, when the star sets. The eastern or western amplitude, being also called northern or southern, as they fall in the northern or southern quarters of the horizon.

8. Magnetical amplitude is an arch of the horizon, contained between the sun at his rising,
and the east or west point of the compass;
or, it is the difference of the rising or setting of the sun,
from the east or west parts of the compass.
Chambers.

AMPLY. adv. [amply, Lat.]

1. Largely; liberally.
So amply, and with hands so liberal,
Thou hast provided all things.
Milton.
The evidence they had before was enough, and yet, to convince them; but they were resolved not to be convinced; and to those, who are resolved not to be convinced, all arguments, are equal.
Atterbury.

2. At large; without reserve.
At return
Of him so lately promis'd to thy aid,
The watchman's seed, obscurely then foretold,
Now amplier known, thy Saviour, and thy Lord.
Milton.

3. At large; copiously; with a diffusive detail.
Some parts of a poem require to be amply written, and with all the force and elegance of words; others must be cast into shadows; that is, passed over in silence, or but faintly touched.
Drayden's Defensyce.

To AMPUTATE. v. a. [amputate, Lat.]

To cut off a limb: a word used only in chirurgery.
Amongst the emirs, it was explained, that they had no men too active in committing fre-tered members.

AMPUTATION. n. s. [amputation, Fr.
amputation, Lat.]
The operation of cutting off a limb, or other part of the body. The usual method of performing it, in the instance of a leg, is as follows:
The proper part for the operation being four or five inches below the knee, the skin and flesh are first to be drawn very tight upwards, and seced from returning by a ligature two or three inches from the knee; another ligature above the one passed, for the grieve; which being brought by means of a stick, may be strained to any degree at pleasure in the patient being conveniently situated, and the operator placed to the inside of the limb, which is to be held by an assistant above, and another below the part designed for the operation, and the grieve sufficiently twisted to prevent too large an harmourage, the flesh is, with a stroke or two, to be separated from the bone with the disseminating knife.
Then the periosteum being also divided from the bone with the back of the knife, saw the bone sawdker, with as few strokes as possible;
the two parallel bones are concerned, the flesh that grows between them must likewise be separated before the part of the grieve. This being done, the ligature may be soothed, to give an opportunity of searching for the large blood vessels, and securing them with moutchings. After dissecing proper applications to the stump, loosen the first grieve, and pull both the skin and the flesh, as far as conveniently may be, over the stump, to cover it; and secure them with a cross stitch made at the depth of half or three quarters of an inch in the skin. Then apply plasters, astringents, plasters, and other necessary. Chambers.

The Amazons, by the amputation of their right hand, had the freer use of their bow.
Brown's Fugger Errors.

A'mulet, n. s. [amulet, Fr. amulet, or amuleuom, quaed malum amuletum,
Lat.] An appended remedy, or preser-Vative; a thing hung about the neck, or any other part of the body, for preventing or curing of some particular diseases.
That spirits are corporeal, seems at first view a conjectur derived to himself; yet herein he established the doctrine of inestimable, amulets and charms. Brown's Fugger Errors.

They do not certainly know the falsity of what they report; and their ignorance must serve you as an amulet against the guilt both of deceit and of the Government of the Tong.

AMURC'OSITY, n. s. [amurca, Lat.] The quality of less or meekness of any other thing.

Dict

To AMUSE. v. a. [amuse, Fr.]

1. To entertain with tranquillity; to fill with thoughts that engage the mind, without distracting it. To divert implies something more lively, and to please, something more important.
It is therefore frequently taken in a sense bordering on contempt.

They think the learned amuse, and are arrived to some extraordinary revelations; when, indeed, they do but dream dreams, and amuse themselves with the fantastick ideas of a bankrupt imagination.
Dryden's Poems.

I cannot think it natural for a man, who is much in love, to amuse himself with trifles. Wycherley.

2. To draw on from time to time; in to keep in expectation as, he amused his folowers by quicker idle promises.

AMUSE'MENT, n.s. [amusement, Fr.]
That which amuses; entertainment.
Every interest or pleasure of life, even the most trilling amusement, is suffered to postpone the one thing necessary.

During his confinement, his amusement was to give poison to dogs and cats, and see them expire by slower or quicker torments.

I was left to stand the battle, while others, who had better talents than a draper, thought it more convenient amusing themselves with safety, whilst another was giving them diversion at the hazard of his liberty.

Suffet.

AMUSE'RING, adj. [from amuse.] That which has the power of amusing. I know not that this is a current word.
But amuzel', Beholds til' amuse' ire before him fly.
Then vanish quite away.
Thomson.

AMYGDALATE. adj. [amygdala, Lat.] Made of almonds.

AMYGDALINE. adj. [amygdala, Lat.] Relating to almonds; resembling almonds.

AN. article. [ane, Saxone; en, Dutch;
eine, German.] The article indefinite, used before a vowel, or h mute. See A.

One, but with less emphasis; as, there stands an ox.
Since he cannot be always employed in study, reading, and conversation, there will be many an hour, besides what his exercises will take up.

2. Any, or some; as, an elephant might swim in this water.

He was no way at an uncertainty, nor ever in the least at a loss concerning any branch of it.

A wit's a feather, and a chief a nod.
An honest man's the noblest work of God. Pope.

3. Sometimes it signifies, like a, some particular state; but this is now disused.

It is certain that colours do, in a small degree, nourish; especially the colour of wine; and we see men an hunghed do love to smell hot bread.
Bacon.

1. An is sometimes, in old authors, a contraction of and if.
He can't batter, be!

An honest mind and plain; he must speak truth,
As they will take it so; if not, he's plain.
Shakespeare.

2. Sometimes it is a contraction of as if before.
Well I know
The clerk will nor wear hair on his face that had it
(He will an' if he live to be a man.
Shakespeare.

5. Sometimes it is a contraction of as if before.
My next pretty correspondent, like Shek-peare's lion in Pyramus and Thisbe, roars an'
it was any nothing.
In Addison.

A.N.A. adj. [Ana.] A word used in the prescriptions of physic, importing the like quantity; as, wine and honey, 0 or 00 3/1; that is, of wine and honey each two ounces.

In the same weight innocence and prudence take.
A.N.A. does the just mixture make. Conley.

He'll bring an apothecary with a chargeable long bill of Ana.
Drayden.

A.N.A. n.s. (Abbr.) A word so called from the last syllables of their titles; as, Sealegera, Thuanina; they are loose thoughts, or casual hints, dropped by eminent men, and collected by their friends.

ANA'CAMPTICK. adj. [anacampstick.] Reflexing, or reflected; an ana campick sound, an echo; an anemopitick hill, a hill that produces an echo.

Anemopiticks. n.s. [See Cathartic.] The doctrine of reflected light, or catoptricks. It has no singular.

Anacathetic. n.s. [Anachoret.] Any medicine that works upwards.

Quinty.

Anacaphelseis, n.s. [Anaphylaxis.] Recapitulation, or summary of the principal heads of a discourse. Diet.

Anachoret. n.s. [sometimes vitri-.

Anachorite. I ouly written anachorite; chron. A monk who, with the leave of his superior, leaves the conven for a more austere and solitary life.

Yet lest not love dead here, but here doth sit,

Either may be probably maintained against the imagination of the analytical experiments vulgarly relied on.

2. That which proceeds by analysis, or by taking the parts of a compound into distinct and particular consideration.

Boyle.

According to Watts's analysis, the giving of the leaves is, it seems, a common property, and is therefore it is called the method of resolution.

Watson's Logic.

To ANALYZE. v. a. [anælaiz.] To resolve a compound into its first principles.

See Analysis.

Consists in reducing us to deputes, and in some measure, to analyze them, and take asunder their heterogeneous parts, in many chemical experiments, we may, better than in others, know what manner of bodies we have...art; having made them more simple or uncompounded, than nature alone is wont to present us.

Boyle.

To analyze the immateriality of any action into its last principles; if it be required, Why such an action is to be avoided? The immediate answer is, because it is sin.

Noyes's Wills.

When the sentence is distinguished into subject and predicate, proposition, argument, act, object, cause, effect, adjunct, opposite, etc. then it is analyzed analogically and metaphysically. This last is what is chiefly meant in the theological schools, when they speak of analyzing a text of scripture.

Watson's Logic.

ANALYZER. n. s. [from To analyze.]

Dryden.

ANATOMY. n. s. [anatôm.] 1. The art of dissecting the body.

It is proverbially said, Fornix seulus inert habit, et attenuat intellectum; whereas these parts of anatomy hath not discovered in insects. Brown's Vulg. Err.

It is therefore in the anatomy of the mind, as in that of the body; more good will accede to mankind, by attending to the large, open, and perceptible parts, than by studying too much such fine nerves and vessels, as will for ever escape our observation.

Pope.

2. The doctrine of the structure of the body, learned by dissection.
ANC

Let the muscles be well inserted and bound together, according to the knowledge of which this is given us by anatomy.

3. The act of dividing anything, whether corporeal or intellectual.

When a moneyed man hath divided his estates, he seeketh to himself richer than he was; therefore, a man devise, any thing, is to break it, and to make anatomy of it in several parts. Bacon.

4. The body stripped of its integuments; a skeleton.

O that my tongue were in the thunder's mouth, Then would my voice shake the world; And rouse from sleep that fell anatomy, Which cannot hear a feeble lady's voice. Shaksp.

ANCIENT. adj. [ancien, Fr. antiquus, Lat.]

1. Old; that happened long since; of old time; not modern. Ancient and old are distinguished; old relates to the duration of the thing itself; as, an old coat, a coat much worn; and ancient; to time in general, as, an ancient dress, a habit used in former times. But this is not always observed, for we mention old customs; but though old be sometimes opposed to modern, ancient is seldom opposed to new, but when new means modern.

Ancient society is that whereof all the manners belonging to the crown, in St. Edward's or William the Conqueror's days, did hold. The number and names of which manners, as all others belonging to common customs, he cannot be written in a book, after a survey made of them, now remaining in the Exchequer, and called Doomsday Book; and such as by that book appeared to have belonged to the crown at that time, are called ancient denumies. Coke.

2. Of date; that has been of long duration.

With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of days understanding. Job, xii. 12.

Thales affirms, that God comprehended all things, and that God was ancient, or that God was most ancient, because he never had any beginning. Raleigh.

Industrie.

Gave the tall ancient forest to his axe. Thomson.

ANGUN. n. s. [angul, Germ. and Dutch.] An instrument to take fish, consisting of a rod, a line, and a hook.

She also had an angel in her hand; but the taken was so taken, that she had forgotten tak- ing. Sidney.

Give me thine angle, we'll to the river there. My muskellunge, I will betray. Tawny-fain'd fish; my bouding hook shall pierce. Their slimy jaws. Shakespeare.

ANGUS. The patient fisher takes his silent stand, Intent, his thumb trembling in his hand; With looks unmoved, he holds the scanty beard, And eyes the dancing cork and bending reed. Pope.

To ANGLE. v. h. [from the noun.] 1. To fish with a rod and hook.

The ladies angling in the crystal lake, Feast on the waters with the prey they take. Walton.

2. To try to gain by some insinuating artifices, as fishes are caught by a bait.

If he spoke courteously, he angled the people's hearts; if he were silent, he was imposed upon some dangerous catch. Sidney.

This seeming brow of justice, did sit In the hearts of all that did angler for. Shaksp.

The pleasantest angling is to see the fish Cut with her golden ones the silver stream, And greedily devour the treacherous bait; So angler we for Beatrice. Shakespeare.

ANGLE ROD. n. s [angle roede, Dutch.] The stick to which the line and hook are hung.

It differeth much in greatness; the smallest being upwards of forty, and the greatest hundred and sixty; for the former largeness is used for angle-rods; and, in China, for beating of sounding upon the thimbles. Bacon.

He keeps a May-fly or worm, and furnishes the whole country with angle-rods. Addison.

ANGLER. n. s. [from angle.] He that fishes with an angle.

He, like a patient angler, ere he strook, Would let them play a while upon the hook. Dryden.

Neither do birds alone, but many sorts of fishes, feed upon insects; as is well known to anglers, who live by their hooks with them. Roy.

ANGUCISM. n. s. [from Anglus, Lat.] A form of speech peculiar to the English language; an English idiom. They corrupt their stile with untutored angulus, Milton.

ANGOUR. n. s. [angor, Lat.] Pain.

If the patient be surprised with a phthisymous angour, and great oppression about the stomach, take of cordials, or the like. Herring.

ANGRILY. adv. [from angrily.] In an angry manner; furiously; perversely.

I will sit as quiet as a lamb; I will not stir, nor wince, nor speak a word, Nor look upon the iron angrily. Shakespeare.

ANGRYS. adj. [from anger.] 1. Touched with anger; provoked.

Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak peevish.

2. It seems properly to require, when the object of anger is mentioned, the particle of before a thing, and with before a perfect; but this is not always observed. Your Curiosity is not much misled, but with his friends; the commonwealth doth stand, and so would do, were he angry at it. Shakespeare.

The north wind doth drive that heavy rain; so doth an angry countenance a backslending tongue. Prov. xxv. 23.

3. Having the appearance of anger; having the effect of anger.

The north wind doth drive that heavy rain; so doth an angry countenance a backslending tongue.

4. In chirurgery, painful; inflamed; smarting.
ANG

This venom, being accompanied by the thinner parts of the blood, grows red and angry; and, wanting its due regress into the mass, first gathers into a hard swelling, and, in a few days, opens into matter, and so discharged.

"Wichert."

ANGUSH. n. s. [anguiss, Fr. anguer, Lat.] Excessive pain either of mind or body; applied to the mind, it means the pain of sorrow, and is seldom used to signify other passions.

"Not all so cheerful seemed she of sight, As she her dread did dwell, or anguish, in her heart, is hard to tell."

Fairy Queen.

ANGUSHED. adj. [from anguish.] Seized with anguish; tortured; excessively pained; not in use.

"Feel no touch Of conscience, but of fame, and be."

Dryden.

ANGULAR adj. [from angular.]

1. Having angles or corners; cornered.

"As for the figure of crystal, it is for the most part hexagonal, or six cornered, being built upon a confused matter, from whence, as it were from a root, angular figures arise, even as in the anem-thist and banyan."

Brown's Foul Errors.

2. Consisting of an angle.

"The distance of the edges of the knives from one another, at the distance of four inches from the angular point, where the edges of the knives meet, was the eighth part of an inch."

Newton's Opticks.

ANIMACIÓN n. s. [animaderos, Lat.]

1. Reproof; severe censure; blame.

"He dismissed their commissioners with severe and sharp animadversion."

Shakespeare.

2. Punishment. When the object of animadversion is mentioned, it has the particle on or upon before it.

"When a hill is debating in parliament, it is usual to have the controversy handled by pamphlets on both sides; without the least animadversion upon the authors."

\[\text{Seft.} \]

3. In law.

An ecclesiastical censure, and an ecclesiastical animadversion, are different things: for a censure has a relation to a spiritual punishment, but an animadversion has only a respect to a temporal one; as, degradation, and the delivering the person over to the secular court. Atille's Parergon.

4. Perception; power of notice; not in use.

"The soul is the sole perceipient which hath animadversion and sense, properly so called. Glamelle."

ANIMADVERSION n. s. [from animadvert.]

That has the power of perceiving; perceiveth; not in use.

"The representation of objects to the soul, the only animadverbose principle, is conveyed by notions made on the immediate organs of sense."

Glamelle.

ANIMADVERSIVENESS n. s. [from animadver- sive.]

The power of animadverting, or making judgment.

Dict.

To ANIMADVERT. r. n. [animadverto, Lat.]

1. To pass censures upon.

"I should not animadvert on him, who was a painful observer of the decorum of the stage, if he had not used extreme severity in his judgements of the incomparable Shakespeare."

Dryden.

2. To inflict punishments. In both senses with the particle upon.

"If the Author of the universe animadverted upon men here below, how much more will it become him to do it upon their entrance into a higher state of being?"

Crew.

ANIMADER. n. s. [from animad- vert.]

He that passes censures, or inflicts punishments.

"God is a strict observer of, and a severe animadverter upon, such as presume to partake of those mysteries, without such a preparation."

South.
2. By way of contempt, we say of a stupid man, that he is a stupid animal.

ANIMAL. adj. [animalis, Lat.]

1. That which belongs or relates to animals.
2. Animal functions, distinguished from natural and vital, are the lower powers of the mind; as the will, memory, and imagination.
3. Animal life is opposed, on one side, to intellectual; and, on the other, to vegetable.
4. Animal is used in opposition to spiritual or rational; as, the animal nature.

ANIMALCULE, n.s. [animalculum, Lat.]
A small animal; particularly those, which are in their first and smallest state.
We are to know, that they all come of the species of animalcula of their own kind, that were before laid there.

ANIMALITY, n.s. [from animal.] The state of animal life.

The word animal, in the first proposition, only signifies human animality. In the minor proposition, the word animal, for the same reason, signifies animality of a coarse; there by it becomes an ambiguous term, and unfit to build the conclusion upon.

To ANIMATE. v.a. [anim:o, Lat.]
1. To quicken; to make alive; to give life to: as, the soul animates the body; man must have been animated by a higher power.
2. To give powers to; to heighten the powers or effect of any thing.

As none, but none can animate the Tyre, and the mute strings with vocal sounds inspire: Whether the mind of Minerva be her theme, Or chaste Diana bathing in the stream; None can record their heavenly praise so well, As Helen, in whose eyes ten thousand Cupids dwell.

3. To encourage; to incite.

The more to animate the people, he stood on high, from whence he might be best heard, and could give weight to his loud voice.
He was animated to expect the payace, by the prediction of a soothsayer, that one should succeed Upe Leon, whose name should be Adrian.

ANIMATE. adj. [from To animate.]
Alive; possessing animal life.

All bodies have spirits and mechanical parts within them; but the main differences, between animate and inanimate, are two: the first is, that the spirits of things animate are all contained within themselves, and have legations in veins and secret canals, as blood is: and, in living creatures, the spirits have not only branches, but certain cells or seats, where the principal spirits do revolve, and whereunto the rest do resort; but the spirits in things inanimate are shut in, and cut off by the tangible parts, and are not pervious to another side of air in snow.

Nobil birth.

Of creatures animate with gradual life, Of growth, sense, reason, all summoned up in man.

There are several topics used against atheism and deism; on the one side the marks of divine wisdom and goodness in the works of the creation, the vital union of souls with matter, and the animated structure of animal bodies.

ANIMATELY, adv. participial adj. [from animate.] Lively; vigorous.

whole body will be full of light, Math. vi, that all Christians will be, by way of conciliation or annexation, attend them. Hammond.
2. Union; act or practice of adding or uniting.
How annexations or bounties first came into the law, or by the prince's authority, or the pope's licence, is a very great dispute.
Ayliffe's Parergon.

ANNEXATION. n.s. [from annex.] The act of annexing; addition.
It is necessary to engage the fears of men, by the annexation of such penalties, as will over-balance temporary pleasure.
Rogers.

ANNEXMENT. n.s. [from annex.] 1. The act of annexing.
2. The thing annexed.
When it falls, Each small annexment, petty consequence, Attends the host's ruin. Shakespeare.

ANNIHILABLE. adj. [from annihilate.] That which may be reduced to nothing;
that which may be put out of existence.

To ANNIHILATE. v.a. [ad and nihilium, Lat.] 1. To reduce to nothing; to put out of existence.
It is impossible for any body to be utterly annihilated; but that it was the work of the omnipotency of God to make somewhat of noting, so it required the like omnipotency to turn nothing into another thing. Bacon.
Then taught I thee, by making thee
Love her, who doth neglect both me and thee,
'T invent and practise this one way, t' annihilate devour all three.
Dickens.
He despised of God's mercy; he, by a decallation of all hope, annihilated his mercy.
Whose friendship can stand against assaults, strong enough to annihilate the friendship of puny nations; such an one has reached true constancy.
South.
Some imagined, water sufficient to a deluge was required; and, when the business was done, disavowed and annihilated.
Woodward.
2. To destroy, so as to make the thing otherwise than it was.
The flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated, this place, so as no man can find any mark or memory thereof.
Rogers.
3. To annual; to destroy the agency of any thing.
There is no reason, that any one commonwealth should annihilate that, upon which the whole world has agreed.
Hoggar.

ANNIHILATION. n.s. [from annihilate.] The act of reducing to nothing.
The state of being reduced to nothing.
God hath his influence into the very essence of things, without which their utter annihilation could not choose but follow.
Hoggar.
Without knowledge, which as spirits we obtain,
Is to be valued in the midst of pain:
Annihilation were to lose heart more;
We are not quite exiled, where thought can soar.
Drayton.

ANNIVERSARIES. n.s. [anniversariis, Lat.] 1. A day celebrated as it returns in the course of the year.
For encouragement to follow the example of martyrs, the primitive christians met at the places of their martyrdom, to praise God for them, and to observe the anniversary of their sufferings.
Silligef. 2. The act of celebration, or performance, in honour of the anniversary day.
Dome had never seen Mrs. Drury, whom he has made immortal in his admirable anniversaries.
Drayton.
3. Anniversaries is an office in the Romish church, celebrated now only once a year, which ought to be said daily through the year, for the soul of the deceased.
Ayliffe's Parergon.

ly; every year.

ANNOUNCED. adj. [from annual.] Yearly; every year.

ANNUALITY. n.s. [annuité, Fr.] 1. A yearly rent to be paid for term of life or years. The differences between a rent and an annuity are, that every rent is going out of land; but an annuity charges only the grantor, or his heirs, that have assets by descent. The second difference is, that, for the recovery of an annuity, no action lies, but only the writ of annuity against the grantor, his heirs, or successors; but of a rent, the same actions lie as do of land. The third difference is, that an annuity is never taken for assets, because it is no freehold in law; nor shall be put in execution upon a statute merchant, statuteable, or eligible, as a rent may. Cowell.
A N O

2. A yearly allowance.

He was generally known to be the son of one earl, and brother to another; who supplied his expence, beyond what his annuity from his father would pay. Clarendon.

To ANNUL, v. a. [from nullus.] 1. To make void; to nullify; to abrogate; to abolish.

Antimony. n. s. [The stibium of the ancients, by the Greeks called φιάτα.] The reason of its modern denomination is referred to Basil Valentine, a German monk; who, as the tradition relates, having thrown some of it to the hogs, observed that, after it had purged them heartily, they immediately fattened; and therefore he imagined his fellow monks would be the better for a like dose. The experiment, however, succeeded so ill, that they all died of it; and the medicine was thenceforward called antimony, antimonk.

Antimony is a malleable substance, of a metallic nature, having all the seeming characters of a real metal, except malleability; and may be called a semimetal, being neither of the opposite side of that, with a sulphurous and stony substance. Mines of all metals afford it; that in gold mines is reckoned best. It has also its own mines in Hungary, Germany, and France. Its texture is full of little shining veins or threads, like needles; brittle as glass. Sometimes veins of a red or golden colour are intermixed, which is called male antimony; that without them being designated female antimony. It fuses in the fire, though with some difficulty; and dissolves more easily in water. It destroys and disintegrates all metals fused with it, except gold; and it is therefore useful in refining. It is a common ingredient in scopolium, or burning con-cave; serving to give them a finer polish. It makes a part in bell metal; and renders the sound more clear; and so makes it more hard, white, and smooth; and with lead, in the casting of printer's letters, to render them more smooth and even. It is a universal help in the melting of metals, and especially in casting of cannon balls. In pharmacy it is used under various forms, and with various intentions, chiefly as a medicine. Chambers.

Antinephritic. adj. [from ἄρτι, against, and Νήφρος.]

A figure in grammar, by which one case is put for another.

Antiquary. n. s. [antiquarius, Lat.]

A man studious of antiquity; a collector of ancient things.

All arts, manners, and inventions, are but the relics of an intellect defaced with sin. We admire it now, only as antiquaries do piece of old coin, for the stamp it once bore. With sharpen'd eye and pale antiquaries pore.

Th' inscription value, but the rust adores. Pop.

The rude Latin of the monks is still very intelligible; had their records been delivered in the ANT

culgar tongue, they could not now be understood, unless by antiquaries. Swift.

ANTIQUARY, adj. [This word is improper.] Old; antique.

Here's Nestor.

Instructed by the antiquities times; he must, he is, he cannot but be wise. Shaksp.

To ANTICATE, v. a. [antiquate, Lat.] To put out of use; to make obsolete.

The growth of Christianity in this kingdom might reasonably introduce new laws, and quire or abrogate some old ones, that seemed less consistent with the Christian doctrines. Hak.

That's admissible. But I cannot admire the height of his invention, and the strength of his expression, without defending his antiquary words, and the perpetual hardness of their sound.

Drayton.

1. A kind of monkey, remarkable for imitating what he sees.

If we fix the more new-fangled than an ape; more giddy in my desires, than a monkey. Shakespeare.

Writers report, that the heart of an ape, worn near the heart, comforteth the heart, and increaseth the fear of the Lord. It is true, that the ape is a merry and bold beast. Bacon.

With glistening gold and sparkling gems they shine. But apes and monkeys are the gods within. Granville.

Celestial Beings, when of late they saw
A mortal man unfold all Nature's law,
Admir'd such knowledge in a human shape,
And show'd a Deity, as we show an ape. Pope.

2. An imitator; used generally in the bad sense.

Julius Romano, who, had he himself eternity, and could put breath into his work, would have beguiled Nature of her custom, so perfectly is he the ape. Shakespeare.

To APE. v. a. [from ape.] To imitate, as an ape imitates human actions.

Aping the foreigner in every dress;
Which, bought at greater cost, becomes him less. Dryden.

Curse on the stripling! how he ape's his sire! Amidst sly sneers! Addison.

APERITON. n. s. [from aperico, Lat.] 1. An opening; a passage through any thing; a gap.

The next in order are the aperitons; under which term I do comprehend doors, windows, stair-cases, chimney's, or other conduits; in short, all inlet's or outlet's. Wotton.

2. The act of opening; or state of being opened.

The plenteous passages of vessels, otherwise called the pleurone, when it happens, causeth an evacuation of blood, either by rupture or aperitons of the body. Wasson.

APERITY. adv. [aper'ti, Lat.] Openly; without covert.

APERITNESS. n. s. [from aperico] Openness.
A P H

The freedom or aperture, and vigour of pronunciation, and the closeness of inflected, and facility of speaking, render the sound different.

Holder.

A P E R T U R E, n. s. [from aperture, open.]

1. The act of opening.

Hence aright, the facility of joining a consonant to a vowel; because, from an appulse to an aperture is easier, than from one appulse to another.

2. An open place.

If memory be made by the easy motion of the spirits through the opened passages, images (without doubt) pass through the same aperture.

Glanville.

3. The hole next the object glass of a telescope or microscope.

The concave metal have an aperture of an inch; but the aperture was limited by an appulse circle, performed in the middle.

Newton's Optics.

A P H I R O S M. n. s. [ἀφθιρόςμ.] A maxim; a precept, contracted in a short sentence; an unconnected position.

He will easily discern, how little of truth there is in the multitude; and, though sometimes they are attainted with that aphorism, will hardly believe the voice of the people to be the voice of God.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

I shall at present consider the aphorism, that a man of religion and virtue is a more useful, and consequently a more valuable, member of society.

Aphoristical. adj. [from aphorismus.] In the form of an aphorism; in separate and unconnected sentences.

Aphoristically. adv. [from aphoristic.] In the form of an aphorism.

Those, being carried down, seldom miss a cure;
APOLOGICAL. adj. [from ἄπολογος.] That, which is said in defence of any thing or person. I design to publish an essay, the greater part of which is apologetic, for one sort of chymists. Bogle.

APOLOGETICALLY. adj. [from apologetic.] In the way of defence or excuse.APOLOGIST. n. s. [from ἄπολογος.] He, that makes an apology; a pleader in favour of another.

To APOLLOGIZE. n.s. [from apology.] 1. To plead in favour of any person or thing. It will be much more reasonable, to reform, than apologise or retract; and therefore it imports those, who dwell secure, to look about them. Denham.

2. It has the particle for, before the subject of apology. I sought to apologize, for my indiscretion in the whole undertaking. I wake’s Proverb, for Death. The translator needs to apologize, for choosing of this piece, which was made in his childhood. Pope’s Preface to Statues.

APOLOGUE. n.s. [ἄπολογος.] Fable; story contrived to teach some moral truth. An apologue of Esop is beyond a syllologue; and proves more powerful than dem astration. Brown’s Fug, Error. Some men are remarked for p R:esentness in railing stories for apologues and apocryphal diverging stories. Letch.

APOLOGY. n.s. [apologia, Lat. ἄπολογος.] 1. Defence; excuse. Apology generally signifies, rather excuse, than vindication; and tends, rather to extenuate the fault, than prove innocence. This is, however, sometimes unregarded by writers. In her face excuse. Came prologue, and apology too prompt; Which, with bland words at will, she thus addressed. Milton.

2. It has for, before the object of excuse. It is not my intention, to make an apology, for my poem: some will think, it needs no excuse; and other will receive it, as doable. Drayton. I shall neither trouble the reader nor myself, with any apology for publishing of these verses: for, if they be (in any measure) truly serviceable, to the end, for which they are designed, I do see what apology is necessary; and, if they be not so, I am sure none can be sufficient. Ticknor.

APOGEOmetry. n.s. [ἄπολογος, from ἄπολογος, and μέτρον, distance, and μέτρον, to measure.] The art of measuring things at a distance. Dict.

APONEUROSIS. n.s. [from ἄπολογος, and ἄνευς, a nerve.] An expansion of a nerve into a membrane. When a cyst rises near the office of the artery, it is formed by the aponeurosis, that runs over the vessel, which becomes excessively expanded. Sharp’s Surgery.

APOPHASIS. n.s. [Lat. ἄποφασις, a denying.] A figure in rhetoric, by which the orator, speaking ironically, seems to wave, what he would plainly insinuate; as, Neither will I mention those things, which if I should, you notwithstanding could neither confute or speak against. Smith’s Rhetoric.

APOPHLEGMATISM. n.s. [ἄποφασις] That, which has the quality of drawing away phlegm. APOPHLEGMATISM. n.s. [ἄποφασις] and ἄφθογα] Medicine, of which the intention is, to draw phlegm from the blood. And so it is in apophlogitismus and gargarismus, by which the phlegm is driven down by the palate. Bacon.

APOPHLEGMATIZANT. n.s. [ἄποφασις] and ἄφθογα] Any remedy, which causes an evacuation of serous or mucous humour by the nostrils, as particular kinds of sternotomaries. Quincy.

APOPHIKEUM. n.s. [ἄποφασις] A remarkable saying; a valuable maxim, uttered on some sudden occasion. We may magnify the apophthegms, or reputed pieces of wisdom, where many are to be seen. Laertius and Lyaeusthenes. Brown’s Fugl Error. I had a mind, to collect and digest such observations and apophthegms, as tend to the proof of that great assertion, ‘All is vanity.’ Prior.

APOPHYGE. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] flight or escape. Is, in architecture, that part of a column, which begins at spring out of its base; and was originally no more, than the ring or ferrel, which anciently bound the extremities of wooden pillars, to keep them from splitting, and were afterwards imitated in stone work. We sometimes call it the spring of the column. Chambers.

APOPHYSIS. n.s. [ἀποφυσίς.] The prominent parts of some bones; the same as process. It differs from an epiphysis, as it is a continuance of the bone itself; whereas the latter is somewhat adhering to a bone, and of which it is not properly a part. Quincy.

APOLLO. adj. [from apoller.] Relating to an apoplexy. We meet with the same complaints of gravity in living bodies, when the facultys locomotive seem abolished; as may be observed, in supporting persons incumbered, apoplectic, or in lymphatics and stubbornings. Brown’s Fugl Error. In an apoplectic case, he found extravagated blood, making way from the ventricles of the brain. Denham.

APOLLECTIC. adj. [from apoller.] Relating to an apoplexy. A lady was seized with an apoplectic fit, which afterwards terminated in some kind of lethargy. Wircum.

APOPLEX. n.s. [See Apoplexy.] Aphoplexy, the last syllable is cut away; but this is only in poetry. Present punishment pursues his way; When surfeited and swoll’n, the peacock raw He bears into the bath; whence want of breath, Repletion, apoplexy, interstate death. Dryden.

APOPLEXED. adj. [from apoller.] Seized with an apoplexy. Sense (sure) you have, Else you could not have motion; but (sure) that Sense is apoplexy. Shakespeare.

APOPLEXIA. n.s. [ἀποφυσία.] A sudden deprivation of all internal and external sensation, and of all motion, unless of the heart and thorax. The cause is generally a repletion; and indicates evacuation, joined with stimuli. Quincy. Apoplexy is a sudden abolition of all the senses, external and internal, and of all voluntary motion, by the stoppage of the flux and reflux of the animal spirits through the nerves, destined for those motions. Arithmetical on Dict.

APOPOLOGY. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] Figure is a very apoplectic; lethargy, maddened, dead, sleep, which is exceedingly natural. Maturi. A fever may take away my reason or memory; and an apoplectic leave neither sense nor understanding. Locke.

APOPOLOGUE. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] is a figure in rhetoric; by which the speaker shews, that he doubts, where to begin for the multitude of matter; or what to say, in some strange and ambiguous thing; and doth, as it were, argue the case with himself. Thus Cicero says, Whether he took them from his felohe more impudently, gave them to a harlot more lasciviously, removed them from the Roman people more wickedly, or altered them more presumptuously, I cannot well declare. Smith’s Rhetoric.

APOPOLOGUE. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] Ellipsoid, emoliation; something emitted by another: not in use. The reason of this he endeavours to make out, by atemical apoplectic; which, passing from the cranium weapon to the wound, and being incorporated with the particles of the brain, they carry them to the affected part. Gredos Scopes.

APOPOLOGUSIS. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] Ellipsoid, from ἄποφασις, and σιγαίνω to be silent. A form of speech, by which the speaker, through some affection (as sorrow, bashfulness, fear, anger) or vehemenacy, breaks off his speech before it be fully ended. A figure, when speaking of a thing, we yet seem to conceal it, though indeed we aggravate it; or when the course of the sentence begins to be stayed, as thereby some part of the sentence, not being uttered, may be understood. Smith’s Rhetoric.

APOPOLOGY. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] Departure from what a man has professed; it is generally applied to religion; sometimes with the particle from. The canons law defines apoplectic to be a wild departure from that state of faith, which any person has expressed himself to hold, in the Christian Church. Aplege's Parece.

APOPOLOGY. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] An able archangel had forehead Adam, by that hand he was an apostate; by what held in heaven, Milton. A piece we are not only wickedness, but apa toplex, degenerate wickedness. Smyt. Whoever do give different worships, must bring in more gods; which is an apoplectic from one God. Stillingfleet.

APOPOLOGY. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] One, that has forsaken his profession; generally applied to one, that has left his religion. The angels, for disobedience, they last reserved to a miserable immortality; but, un a man, equally rebellious, equally apoplectic from thee and goodness, thou hast given a saviour. Aplege's Sermon. Aplege's point of faith are, according to the civil law, subject unto all punishments ordained against hereticks. Aplege.

APOPOLOGY. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] After the manner of an apoplectic. To wear turbans, is an apoplectic conformity. Smith.

APOPOLOGUE. n.s. [ἀποφυγή] To forsake one's profession; it is commonly used of one who departs from his religion.
None revolt from the faith, because they must not look upon a woman to lust after her; but, because they have retired from the generation of their lusts. If wanton glances and licentious thoughts had been permitted by the gospel, they would have apostatized notwithstanding.

To APOSTATE. v. n. [from apostate.] To become an apostate; to swell and corrupt into matter. There is care to be taken in abscesses of the breast and belly, in danger of breaking inwards; yet, by opening these too soon, they sometimes become apoplectic again, and become crude.

APOSTEMIFICATION. n.s. [from apostate.] The formation of an apostate; the gathering of a hollow turbulent tumour. There is a peculiarity in Homer's manner of apostrophizing, and speaking of him in the second person; it is generally applied only to me of account.

APOSTLE. n. s. [apostolos] A person sent with mandates by another. It is particularly applied to them, whom our Saviour deputed to preach the gospel.

But all his mind is bent to holiness; his champions are the prophets and apostles.

APOSTLESHIP. n.s. [from apostle.] The office or dignity of an apostle.

Where, because faith is in too low degree, I thought it some apostleship in me.

2. The thing appearing; a form; a visible object.

I have mark'd
A thousand blushing apparitions
To start into her face; a thousand innocent shamers
In angel whiteness bear away those blasphemers. Shaks.

A glorious apparition had (no doubt)
And canall fear, that day, dim'd Adam's eyes.
Johnson.

Any thing besides may take from me the sense, of what appeared; which apparition, it seems, was yours.
-Taylor.

8. A speckle; a walking spirit.

Horatio says, 'twas but phantasy.
Touching this dreadful sight twice seen of us:
Therefore I intreated him,
That, if in this apperition come,
He may approve our eyes, and speak to it.
Shakespeare, Hamlet.

Tender minds should not receive early impressions of goldens, spectres, and apparitions, where withmaids fright them into compliance.
Locke.

One of these phantasies had his right hand filled with darts; which he brandished in the face of all who came up that way.
-Taylor.

From the ordinary therefore they appeal to themelves.
-Hocker.

2. To refer to another, as judge.

Force, or a declared sign of force, upon the person of another, where there is no common superior on earth to appeal to for relief, is the state of war; and it is the want of such an appeal gives a man the right of war, even against an aggressor, though he be in society, and a fellow subject. Locke.
They knew no foe, but in the open field;
And to their cause, and to the gods appeal'd.
Stepney.

3. To call another, as witness.

Whether this, that soul always thinks, be a self-evident proposition, I appeal to mankind.
Locke.

4. To charge with a crime; to accuse: a term of law.

One but flatters us,
As well appeareth by the cause you name;
Namely, V appeal each other of high treason.
Shakespeare.

APPEAL. n.s. [from the verb To appeal.]

1. An appeal is a provocation, from an inferior to a superior judge; whereby the jurisdictions of the inferior judge is for a while suspended, in respect of the cause;
the cognizance being devolved to the superior judge. -Ayliffe's Parerga.

This thing
Deliver them; and your appeal to us, T."n.

There make before them.

Our reason prompts us to a future state, the Last appeal from fortune and from fate,
Where God's all-righteous ways will be decern'd.
-Dryden.

There are distributors of justice, from whom there lies an appeal to the prince.
Addison.

2. In the common law.

An admission, which is a lawful declaration of another man's crime before a competent judge, by one that sets his name to the declaration, and unites to prove it, upon the penalty that may commonly be used for the private accusation of a murderer, by a party who had interest in the party murdered; and of any felon, by one of his accomplices in the fact.
-Coull.

The duke's adjourn.
Thus to retort your manifest appeal,
And put your trial in the villain's mouth,
Which here you came to observe.
Shakespeare.

Hast thou, according to thy oath and bond,
Brought forth Henry Hereford, thy bold son;
Here to make good the bond from late appeal,
Against the duke's appeal? -Shakespeare.

3. A summons, to answer a charge.

Nor shall the sacred character of king
Be urg'd, to shield me from thy bold appeal;
I have no law, thou dost not seek an equal.

A S T R I C T

To A S T R I C T. v. a. [astringe, Lat.] To contract by applications, in opposition to relax: a word not so much used, as constringe.

The solid parts were to be relaxed or astriced, as they let the humour pass, either in too small or too great quantities.

Arabianist on Alhacen's Astriction.

A S T R I C T I O N. n. s. [astriction, Lat.] The act or power of contracting the parts of the body by applications.

Astriction is in a substance, that hath a virtual cold; and it worketh, partly by the same means, that cold doth.

This virtue requireth an astriction; but such an astriction, as is not grateful to the body: for a pleasing astriction doth rather bind in the nerves, than expel them; and therefore such astriction is found in things of a harsh taste.

Levitic substances have proper, for dry astritious constitution; who are subject to astriction of the belly, and the piles. Arabianist on Diet.

A S T R I C T O R Y. adj. [astricterius, Lat.] Astringent; apt to bind. Diet.

ATTAINDER. r. a. [attacker, Fr.] 1. To disgrace; to cloud with ignominy. (Fairy Queen)

Woe to the shield that was as bright as the starry heaven! That Plutus' golden face did attain. (Shakesp.) As, when a cloud his beams doth overlay.

2. To attain, is particularly used for such, as are found guilty of some crime or offence; and especially, of felony or treason. A man is attainted two ways; by appearance, or by process. Attainer by appearance is, by confession, battle, or verdict. Confession is double: one at the bar, before the judges, when the prisoner, upon his indictment read, being asked guilty or not guilty, answers Guilty; never putting himself upon the verdict of the jury: the other is before the coroner, or sanctuary; where he, upon his confession, was (in former times) constrained to abjure the realm; which kind is called attainer by adjuration. Attainer by battle is, when the party appealed; and, choosing to try the truth by combat rather than by jury, is vanquished. Attender by verdict is, when the prisoner at the bar, answering to the indictment Not Guilty, hath an inquest of life and death passing upon him, and is by the verdict pronounced guilty. Attender by process is, where a party flies; and is not found, till five times called publickly in the county, and at last outlawed upon his default. (Cowell)

What sayst thou? Wilt thou be of our counsel?
Say ay, and be the captain of us all. Shakespeare.

2. It is a word by which the sense is enforced; even; yes; certainly; and more than that.
Remember it; and let it make thee crest-fall;
Ay, and alway this thy abridgment pride. Shakespeare.

AYE. adv. [apa, Saxon.] Always; to eternity; for ever. It is now rarely used, and only in poetry.

And now in darksome dungeon, wretched thrall
Remedies for aye he doth him hold.
Fair Queen.
BAB

The second letter of the English alphabet, is pronounced as in most other European languages, by pressing the whole length of the lips together, and forcing them open with a strong breath. It has a near affinity, with the other labial letters; and is confounded by the Germans with P, and by the Gascons with V: from which an epigrammatist remarks, that bibere and rire are in Gascony the same. The Spaniards, in most words, use B or V indifferently.

BAA. n. s. [See the verb.] The cry of a sheep.

— Therefore thou art a sheep,—
Such another proof would make me cry baa.
Shakespeare.

To BAA. v. n. [balo, Lat.] To cry, like a sheep.

Or like a lamb, whose dam away is set,
He treble baa's for help; but none can get.
Sidney.

To BABBLE. v. n. [babblen, Germ. babler, Fr.]

   But hear, rejoice, stand silent, and adore.
   Prior.

2. To talk silly, or irrationally.
   John had conned over a catalogue of hard words; these, he used to babble indifferently, in all companies.
   Arbuthnot.

Let the silent sanctuary show,
What from the babbling schools we may not know.
Prior.

To talk thoughtlessly; to tell secrets.

There is more danger, in a reserved and silent friend, than in a noisy babbling enemy.
D'Israeli.

4. To talk much.
   The babbling echo mocks the hounds,
   Replying shrilly to the well-ton'd horns;
   As, if a double hunt were heard at once.
   Shakespeare.

And had I pow'r, to give that knowledge birth,
In all the speeches of the babbling earth.
Prior.

The babbling echo had desery'd his face;
She, who in other's words her silence breaks.
Addison.

BABBLE. n. s. [babil, Fr.] Idle talk; senseless prattle.
   This babble shall not henceforth trouble me;
   Here is a coil with protestation.
   Shakespeare.

Come, no more!

This is mere moral babble.
   With volleys of eternal babble,
   And clamour more unanswerable, Huddibras.

The babble, insipidness, and folly. I have taken notice of in disputes.

BAR

de, and, for the most part, ends in a sharp point, to which the hooks are closely united. The species are: 1. Common long-eared barley. 2. Winter or square barley, by some called big. 3. Spelt barley, or battlebow barley. All these sorts of barley are sown in the spring of the year, in a dry time. Hopkins says, if the light land, the barley is sown early in March; but in strong clayey soils it is not sown till April. The square barley, or big, is chiefly cultivated in the north of England and in Scotland; and is harder than the other sorts.

Barley is excellent, moistening, and expectorating; but was known by Hippocrates as a proper food in inflammatory distempers.

3. An instrument made commonly of iron for the use of farriers, to hold a horse's nose, to hinder him from struggling when an incision is made. Farr. Dict.

BAROMETER. n. s. [from Zeck weight, and mere, measure.] A machine for measuring the weight of the atmosphere, and the variations in it, in order chiefly to determine the changes of the weather. It differs from the baroscope, which only shows that the air is heavier at one time than another, without specifying the difference. The barometer is founded upon the Torricellian experiment, so called from Torricelli, the inventor of it, at Florence, in 1643. It is a glass tube filled with mercury, horizontally sealed at one end; the other open, and immersed in a basin of stagnant mercury: so that, as the weight of the atmosphere diminishes, the mercury falls, and as it increases, the mercury will ascend; the column of mercury suspended in the tube being always equal to the weight of the incumbent atmosphere.

The measuring the heights of mountains, and finding the elevation of places above the level of the sea, hath been much promoted by baromctrical experiments, founded upon that essential property of the air, its gravity or pressure. As the column of mercury in the barometer is counterpoised by a column of air of equal weight, so whatever causes make the air heavier or lighter, the pressure of it will be thereby increased or diminished, and of consequence the mercury will rise or fall.

Barn. Gravity is another property of air, whereby it counterpoises a column of mercury from twenty-seven inches and one-half to thirty and one-half, the gravity of the atmosphere varying one-tenth, which is its utmost limits; so that the exact specific gravity of the air can be determined when the barometer stands at thirty inches, with a moderate heat of the weather. Arbitract on Diet.

BAROMETRICAL. adj. [from barometer.] Relating to the barometer.

He is very accurate in making barometrical and thermometrical instruments. Berth. Physico-Theol.

BARON. n. s. [The etymology of this word is very uncertain. Baro, among the Romans, signified a brave warrior, or a brutal man; and, from the first of these significations, Menage derives baron, as a term of military dignity.—Others suppose it originally to signify only a man, in which sense baron, or baron, is still used by the Spaniards; and, to confirm this conjecture, our law yet uses baron and femme, husband and wife. Others deduce it from ber, an old Gaulish word, signifying commander; others from the Hebrew בָּרְן, of the same import. Some think it a contraction of par hemme, or peer, which seems least probable.]

1. A degree of nobility, next to a viscount. It may be probably thought, that anciently, in England, all those were called barons, that had such signiories as we now call count barons: and it is said, that, after the Conquest, all such came to the parliament, and sat as nobles in the upper house. But when, by experience, it appeared that the parliament was too much crowded with such multitudes, it became a custom, that none should come but such as the king, for their extraordinary wisdom or quality, thought good to call by writ; which writ ran hac vice tantum. After that, men seeing that this state of nobility was but casual, and depending merely on the prince's pleasure, obtained of the king letters patent of this dignity to them and their heirs male; and these were called barons by letters patent, or by creation, whose posterity are now those barons that are called lords of the parliament; of which kind the king may create more at his pleasure. It is nevertheless thought, that there are yet barons by writ, as well as barons by letters patent, and that they may be discreate by their titles; the barons by writ being those that, to the title of lord, have their own surnames annexed; whereas the barons by letters patent are named by their baronies. These barons, which were first by writ, may now justly also be called barons by prescription; for that they have continued barons, in themselves and their ancestors, beyond the memory of man. There are also barons by tenure, as the bishops of the land, who, by virtue of baronies annexed to their bishoprics, have always had place in the upper house of parliament, and are called lords spiritual.

2. Baron is an officer, as barons of the exchequer to the king: of these the principal is called lord chief baron, and the three others are his assistants, between the king and his subjects, in cases of justice belonging to the exchequer.

3. There are also barons of the cinque ports; two to each of the seven towns, Hastings, Winchelsea, Rye, Runnym, Hiile, Dover, and Sandwich, that have places in the lower house of parliament. Claree. They that bear The cloth of state above, are four barons Of the cinque ports. Shakespeare.

4. Baron is used for the husband in relation to his wife. Claree.

5. A Baron of Life is when the two sides are not cut asunder, but joined together by the end of the backbone. Claree.

Bath, n. s. [bath, Saxon.]
1. A bath is either hot or cold, either of art or nature. Artificial baths have been in great esteem with the ancients, especially in complaints to be relieved by reversion, as in various diseases, by opening the pores of the feet, and also in cutaneous cases. But the modern practice has great recourse to the natural baths; most of which abound with a mineral sulphur, as appears from their turning silver and copper blackish. The cold baths are the most convenient springs, or reservoirs, of cold water to wash in, which the ancients had in great esteem; and the present age can produce abundance of noble cures performed by them. Quiney.

2. A state in which great outward heat is applied to the body, for the mitigation of pain, or any other purpose.

In the height of this bath, when I was more than half stewed in grease, as a Dutchish dish, to be thrown into the Thames.

Shakesp. Merry Wives of Windsor.

The birth of each day's life, sorelabour'd bath.

Balm of hurt minds.

3. In chemistry, it generally signifies a vessel of water, in which another is placed that requires a softer heat than the naked fire. Balbunum Maris is a mistake for balbunum maris, a sea or water bath. A sand heat is sometimes called balbunum siccaum, or cinerum.

Quiney.

We see that the water of things distilled in water, which they called the bath, differed not much from the water of things distilled by fire.

Bacon's Natural History.

4. A sort of Hebrew measure, containing the tenth part of an homer, or seven gallons and four pints, as a measure for things liquid; and three pecks and three pints, as a measure for things dry.

Calmet.

Ten acres of vinyard will yield one bath, and the seed of an oinman will yield an ephah. Is. 19, 10.

To Bath. v. a. [bath, Saxon.]
1. To wash, as in a bath.

Others on silver lakes and rivers bath'd.

Their downy breasts.

Millon's Paradise Lost.

Changing to bathe himself in the river Cydus, through the excessive coldness of these waters, he fell sick, near unto death, for three days. South.

2. To supple or soften by the outward application of warm liquors.

B A T

Bathe them, and keep their bodies soluble the while by oysters and lentive balsamus. Wisom. Sar. I'll bath' your wounds in thy teares for my offence.

Dryden.

3. To wash any thing.

Phænix Dido stood,

Fresh from her wound, her bosom bath'd in blood.

Dryden.

Mars could in mutual blood the centaurs bathe,

And Jove himself give way to Cynthia's wrath.

Dryden.

To Bathe. v. n. To be in the water, or in any resemblance of a bath.

Except they meant to bathe inrecking wounds, I cannot tell.

Shakep. Macbeth.

The delighted spirit

To bathe in fiery floods, or to rest on

In thrilling regions of thick ribbed ice.

Shakep.

The gallants dancing by the river side,

Their bathe in summer, and his winter side. Waller.

But bathe, and, in imperial robes array'd,

Bathing, or Abathing, prep. from, or about.

This word, though a participle in itself, seems often used as a preposition. Except.

The king, your brother, could not choose an advocate.

Whereas I would sooner hear on any subject,

Bathing that only one, his love, than you. Rosc.

If we consider children, we have little reason to think that the old ideas with them, baking, nipping in early, and other sins in them, seems often used as a preposition.

Except.

A battailon is a scanning of wood, two, three, or four inches broad, seldom above one thick, and the length unlimited.

*To Battailon. v. a. [batteir, to beat, Fr.]
1. To beat; to beat down; to shatter: frequently used of walls thrown down by artillery, or of the violence of engines of war.

To appoint battailonngs against the gates, to cast a mowand, and to build a fort. Eipsed.

These hungry words of hers

Have battailon'd me like roaring cannon shot,

And made me almost yield upon my knees.

Shakep.

Britannia there, the fort in vain

Had battailon'd been with golden rain:

Thunder itself had fail'd his task.

Waller.

Be then the naval stores the nation's care,

New ships to build, and battailon'd to repair. Dryden.

2. To wear with beating.

Crowds to the castle mounted up the street,

Battailon'd the pavement with their couriers feet.

Shakep.

If you have a silver saucepan for the kitchen use, let me advise you to battailon it well; this will shew constant good housekeeping.

Swift's Directions to the Cook.

3. Applied to persons, to wear out with service.

The battailon'd veteran strummers here

Pretend at least to bring a modest ear. Southern.

I am a poor old battailon'd fellow, and I would willingly end my days in peace.

Battery. n. s. [from batter, or batterie, Fr.]

1. The act of battering.
   Strong wars they make, and cruel battery bend.
   'Gainst sort of reason, it makes them cry.
   Earthly minds, like mud walls, resist the strongest batteries.
   Locke.

2. The instruments with which a town is battered, placed in order for action; a line of cannon.
   Where is the best place to make our battery next?
   -- I think at the north gate. Shakes.

3. The frame, or raised work, upon which cannons are mounted.

   In an action against a striker, one may be found guilty of the assault; yet acquitted of the battery. There may therefore be assault without batter; but battery always implies an assault. Chambers.

Why does he suffer this rude knave now to knock him about the screech with a dirty shovel, and will not tell him of his action and battery?
Shakes.

Sir, que' the lawyer, not to flatter ye.
You have as good and fair a battery
As heart can wish, and need not shame
The poorest man alive to claim. Hudibras.

Battish. adj. [from bat.] Resembling a bat.

Than sigh divine or holy else, enjoy'd
Infinite beauteousness. Milton

It is also their felicity to have no faith; for enjoying the beatific vision in the fruition of the object of faith, they have received the full

We may contemplate upon the greatness and strangeness of the beatific vision; how a created eye should be so far fortified, as to bear all those glories that stream from the fountain of eternal light. South.

BEATIFICALLY. adv. [from beatific.]

In such a manner as to complete happiness.

Beatifically to behold the face of God, in the fullness of wisdom, righteousness, and peace, is blessless in no way incident upon the creatures of this earth.

BEATIFICATION. n. s. [from beatific.

A term in the Roman church, distinguished from canonization. Beatification is an acknowledgement made by the pope, that the person beatified is in of men, magnificent sentiments of God and his Charms. Dryd.

3. To produce, as accidents.
Is it a time for story, when each minute
Beget a thousand dangers? Denham.

4. It is sometimes used with on, or upon, before the mother.

BEGGER. n. s. [from begg.]
He that procreates, or begetts; the father.

For what their prowess gain’d, the law declares
Is to themselves alone, and to their heirs:
No share of that goes back to the begetter,
But if the sun fights well, and plunders better
Dryd.
Men continue the race of mankind, commonly without the intention, and often against the consent and will, of the begetter. Locke.

BEGGER. n. s. [from beg.] It is more properly written beggar; but the common orthography is retained, because the derivative all preserve the a.

1. One who lives upon alms; one who has nothing but what is given him.
He raneth up the poor out of the dust,
And lifeth up the beggar from the dunghill, to set him among princes. Samuel.
We see the whole equipment of a beggar so drawn by Homer, as even to retain a nobleness and dignity.
Dryd.

2. One who supplicates for any thing; a petitioner; for which beggar is a harsh and contemptuous term.
What subjects will precarious kings regard?
A beggar speaks too softly to be heard. Dryd.

3. One who assumes what he does not possess.
These shamefull beggars of principles, who give this precarios account of the original of things, assume to themselves to be men of reason. Tilt.

To BEGGER. v. a. [from the noun.]
1. To reduce to beggary; to impoverish.
Whose heavy hand hath bow’d you to the grave,
And beggar’d your posterity. Dryd.

For her person, It beggar’d all description; she did lie in her pavilion, cloth of gold, of tissue,
Of pining Venus. Shaks.

BELLARINES. n. s. [from beggarly.] The state of being beggarly; meanness, poverty.

BELLARLY. adj. [from beggar.] Mean; poor; indigent; in the condition of a beggar: used both of persons and things.

I ever will, though he do shake me off.
To beggarly divorce, love him deadly. Shaks.
A beggarly account of empty boxes. Shaks.
Who, that beheld such a bankrupt beggarly fellow as Cromwell entering the parliament house, with a thread-bare, torn cloak, and greyish hat, could have suspected that he should, by the murder of one king and the banishment of another, ascend the throne? Smol.

The next town has the reputation of being extremely poor and beggarly. Swift.
Crownords, by extreme parsimony, saved thirty-four pounds out of a beggarly fellowship. Swift.

BELLARLY. adv. [from beggar.]
Meneoly; despicably; indigently.

They cast their God himself, and thought it unknowable that it was his delight to dwell beggarly. And that he taketh no pleasure to be worshipped, saving only in poor cottages.

BEGAR. n. s. [from beggar.] Indigence; poverty in the utmost degree.
On he brought me into so bare a house, that it was the picture of miserable happiness and rich Simpson.

While I am a beggar, I will rail,
And say there is no sin but to be rich.
And being rich, my virtue then shall be,
To say there is no vice but beggary. Shaks.
We must become not only poor for the present, but reduced, by further mortgages, to a state of beggarly; to beggary of endless years to come. Swift.

To BEGINN. v. n. I began, or begin; I have begun. [beggman, Sax. from br., or by to, and zanann, zan, or zan, to go.]
1. To enter upon something new; applied to persons. Begin every day to repent; not that thou shouldst at all defer it; but all that is past ought to seem little to thee, seeing it is so in itself. Begin Taylor.

2. To commence any action or state; to do the first act, or first part of an act; to make the first step from not doing to doing.

They began at the ancient men which were before the house. Exch.

4. The rudiments, or first grounds or materials.
By viewing nature, nature's handmaid, art, makes mighty things from small beginnings grow.  Dryl.

5. The first part of any thing.
The causes and designs of an action, are the beginnings of these causes, and the difficulties that are met with in the execution of these designs, are the middle; and the unravelling and resolution of these difficulties, are the end.  Erasome.

BEGINN. The participle passive of begin.
But thou, bright morning star, thou rising sun, Which in these latter times hast brought to light.  These mystic seeds, that since the world began Lay hid in darkness may now bring forth, Sir J. Don.

BEHAF. n. s. [This word Skinner derives from half, and interprets it, for my half; as, for my part. It seems to be rather corrupted from behof, profit; the pronunciation degenerating easily to behof; which, in imitation of other words so sounded, was written, by those who knew not the etymology, behal.]
1. Favour; cause favoured: we say in behalf, but for the sake.

He was in confidence with those who designed the destruction of Stratford; against whom he had contracted some prejudice, in the behalf of his nation.  Chartreson.

Wore but my heart as naked to the view,
Marches would see it blest in his behalf.  Aduison.

2. Vindication; support.
He might, in his presence, defy all Arcadian knights, in the behalf of his mistress's beauty.  Sidney.

Lest the fiend,
Or in behalf of man, or to invade
Vain possession, and some new trouble raise.  Milton.

Others believe that, by the two Fortunes, were meant prosperity or affection; and produce, in their behalf, an ancient monument.  Addis.  On Italy.

To BEHAVE. v. a. [from be and have.]
1. To carry; to conduct: used almost always with the reciprocal pronoun.
We behaved not ourselves disorderly among you.  Thees.

Manifest signs came from heaven unto those that behaved themselves manfully.  2 Macabees.

To their wills wedded, to their errors slaves,
No man like them, they think, himself behaves.  Dryden.

We so live, and so act, as if we were secure of the final issue and event of things, however we may behave ourselves.  Aitken.

2. It seems formerly to have had the sense of, to govern; to subdue; to discipline; but this is not now used.

But who his limbs with labours, and his mind behaves with cares, cannot so easily miss.  Fairy Q.

With such sober and unmetted passion
He did behove his anger ere 'twas spent,
As if he had been amazed.  Shaksper.

To BEHOLD. v. n.
To act; to conduct one's self. It is taken either in a good or a bad sense; as, he behaved well or ill.

BEHAVIOUR. n. s. [From behave.]

BONDSWOMAN. n. s. [from bond and woman.]

A woman slave.

My lords, the senators. Are sold for slaves, and their wives for bondswomen. Ben Jonson's Catilina.

BONE. n. s. [ban, Saxon.]

1. The solid parts of the body of an animal, made up of hard fibres, tied one to another by small transverse fibres, as those of the muscles. In a fleshy they are porous, soft, and easily dismembered. As their pores are filled with subcutaneous fat, so they increase, harden, and grow close to one another. They are all spongy, and full of little cells; or are of a considerable firm thickness, with a large cavity, except the teeth; and where they are articulated, they are covered with a thin and strong membrane, called the periosteum. Each bone is much bigger at its extremity than in the middle, that the articulations might be firm, and the bones not easily put out of joint. But, because the middle of the bone should be strong, to sustain its allotted weight, and resist accidents, the fibres are there more closely compacted together, supporting one another; and the bones are made hollow, and consequently not so easily broken as if they had been all solid and smaller. Quincy.

Thin bones are narrowest, thy blood is cold. Mac. There was lately a young gentleman bit to the bone. Tatter.

2. A fragment of meat; a bone with as much flesh as adheres to it.

4. A letter put upon the poppy. A bull is letters called apostolic by the canonists, strengthened with a leaden seal, and containing in them the decrees and commandments of the church of Rome, the bull. Puffendorf. There was another sort of ornament wore by the young nobility, called bullia; round, or of the figure of a heart, hang about their necks like diamond crosses. Those bullia came afterwards to be hung to the diapasons of the emperors and popes, from whence they took the name of bulls. Arbuthnot. It was not till after a fresh bull of Leo's had declared how inflexible the court of Rome was in the point of abuses. Afterbyer. A blunder; a contradiction. I confess it is what the English call a bull, in the expression, though the sense be manifest enough. Pope's Letters.

Bull, in composition, generally notes the large size of any thing, as bull-head, bulrush, bull-trout; and is therefore only an augmentative syllable, without much reference to its original signification. Bull-baiting. n. s. [from bull and bait.] The sport of baiting bulls with dogs. What am I the wiser for knowing that Trajan was in the fifth year of his tribunate, when he entertained the people with a horse-race bull-baiting? Addison.

Bull-beef. n. s. [from bull and beef.] Coarse beef; the flesh of bulls.

Bull-beet. n. s. [from bull and beet.] A large kind of trout. There is in Northumberland, a trout called a bull-trout, of much a greater length and bigness than any in these southern parts. Walton.

BUL

Gaiter, their leader, desperately fighting amongst the foremost of the Janizaries, was at once shot with two bullets, and slain. Knoller. And as the bull, so different is the fight; The bullock, upon our soil, is no more. Deep in their hulls our deadly bull's eyes light, And through the yielding planks a passage find. Knoller.

BULLION. n.s. [bullion, Fr.] Gold or silver in the lump, unwrought, uncoined. The balance of trade must necessarily be retorted in coin or bullion. Bacon. A second multitude, With wondrous art, found out the massy ore, Seerving each kind, and smaund'd the bullion thus. Milton. Bullion is silver whose workmanship has no value. And thus foreign coin hath no value here for its stamp, and our coin is bullion in foreign dominions. Locke. In every vessel there is stowage for immense treasures, when the cargo is pure bullion. Addison.

BULLITION. n.s. [from bullio, Lat.] The act or state of boiling. There is to be observed in these dissolutions, which will not easily incorporate, what the effects are, as the bullion, the precipitation to the bottOME. — The words to the top, the order in the midst, and the like. Bacon.

BULLY. n.s. [Skinner derives this word from burly, as a corruption in the pronunciation; which is very probably right: or from bulky, or bulleyed; which are less probable. May it not come from bull, the pope's letter, implying the insouciance of those who came invested with authority from the papal court? — A blustering fellow: it is generally taken for a man, that has only the appearance of courage.

Mine host of the garter!—What says my bully rock? Speak scholarly and wisely. Shakspere. All the doors now open, and in comes a crew of roaring bullies, with their wenches, their dogs, and their battles. Tis so ridiculous, but so true within. Dryden. A bully cannot sleep without a bawl. An affrighted one is the best, a more tolerable character than a bully in Petticoats. Addison. The little man is a bully in his nature, but, when he grows choleric, I confine him till his wrath is over. Addison.

To BULLY. r. u. [from the noun.] To overbear with noise or menaces. He that is drunk, or bully'd, pays the treat. King. To BULLY. r. n. To be noisy and quarrelsome. Bulrush. n.s. [from bull and rush.] A large rush, such as grows in rivers, without knots; though Dryden has given it the epithet knotty; confounding it, probably, with the reed. To make fine cures for the nightingale, And baskets of bulrush, was my wont. Spenser. All my praises are but as a bulrush cast upon a stream; they are born by the strength of the current. Dryden.

BULWARK. n.s. [bulwecke, Dutch; probably only from its strength and largeness.]

1. That is now called a boltion. But him the squire made quickly to retreat, Encountering fierce with single sword in hand, And 'twixt him and his lord did as a bulwark stand. Spenser. They oft repair Their carthen bulwecke against the ocean flood. Fairfax. We have bulwarks round us; Within our walls are troops en'd to toil. Addis. 2. A fortification. Bumbast. n.s. [falsely written for bombast; bombast and bombabism being mentioned, with great probability, by Ju- nius, as coming from boom a tree, and sov silk; the silk or cotton of a tree. Mr. Steevens, with much more probability, deduces them all from bomby- clans.] 1. A cloth made by sewing one stuff upon another; patchwork. The usual bambast of black bits sewed into ermine, our English women are made to think very fine. Grew. 2. Linen stuffed with cotton; stuffing; wadding. We have receiv'd your letters full of love, And, in our maiden tongue, rated them As courtship, pleasant jest, and courtesy. As bumbast, and as lining to the time. Shakspere. Bump. n.s. [perhaps from bun, as being prominent.] A swelling; a protuberance. It had upon its brow a bump as big as a young cockrel's stone; a perilous knuck, and it cried bitterly. Shakspere.

BUM. Not though his teeth be beaten out, his eyes Hung by a string, in bumph his forehead rise. Dryd. To BUMP. v. a. [from bumbus, Lat.] To make a loud noise, or bomb. [See BOMB.] It is applied, I think, only to the bittom. Then to the water's brink she laid her head, And as a sinner hung upon a reed. To thee alone, O lake, she said. — Dryden. Bumper. n.s. [from bump.] A cup filled till the liquor swells over the brims. Places his delight All day in playing bumpers, and at night Reels to the bawies. Dryden's Journal.

Bumpkin. n.s. [This word is of uncertain etymology; Henshaw derives it from pumkin, a kind of worthless gourd, or melon. This seems harsh; yet we use the word cabbage-head in the same sense. Bump is used amongst us for a knob, or lump: may not bumpkin be much the same with clodpole, legger-head, block, and blockhead?] An awkward heavy rustick; a country lout. The poor bumpkin, that had never heard of such delights before, blessed herself at the change of her condition. Carlton's Extrage. A heavy bumpkin, taught with daily care, Can never dance three steps with a becoming air. Dryden. In his white cloak the magistrate appears; The country bumpkin the same liv'ry wears. Dryd. It was a favour to admit them to breeding; they might be ignorant bumpkies and clowns, if they pleased. Locke.

Bumpkinly. adj. [from bumpkin.] Having the manners or appearance of a clown; clownish. He is a simple, blundering, and yet corrected fellow, who, sinning at description, and the rustick wonderful, gives an air of bumpkinly romance to all he tells. Clarissa.

BY. In composition, implies something out of the direct way, and consequently some obscurity, as a by-road; something irregular, as a by-end; or something collateral, as a by-concurrence; or private, as a by-law. This composition is used at pleasure, and will be understood by the examples following.

BY-COFFEEHOUSE. n. s. A coffee-house in an obscure place. A coffee-house, that stood at the upper end of a narrow lane, where I met with a rivalour. Addison.

BY-CONCERNMENT. n. s. An affair which is not the main business. Our plays, besides the main design, have under-plots, or by-concernments, or less considerable persons and intrigues, which are carried on with the motion of the main plot. Dryden.

BY-DEPENDENCE. n. s. An appendage; something accidentally depending on another. These, And your three motives to the battle, with I know not how much more, should be demanded; And all the other by-dependencies, From chance to chance. Shakep.

BY-DESIGN. n. s. An incidental purpose. And if she miss the mouse-trap lines, They'll serve for other by-designs, And make an artist understand To copy out her seal or band; Or find void places in the paper, To steal in something to entrap her. Hutcheson.

BY-END. n. s. Private interest; secret advantage. All people that worship for fear, profit, or some other by-end, fall within the imputation of this fable. L'Estrange.

BY-GONE. adj. [a Scotch word.] Past. Tell him, you're sure All in Bohemia's well: this satisfaction The by-gone day proclaim'd. Shakep.

As we have a conceit of motion coming, as well as by-gang: so have we of time, which dependeth thereupon. Grec.

BY-INTEREST. n. s. Interest distinct from that of the public. Various factions and parties, all aiming at by-interest, without any sincere regard to the public good. Atterbury.

BY-LAW. n. s. By-laws are orders made in court-leets, or court-barons, by common assent, for the good of those that make them, farther than the public law binds them. Consell.

There was also a law, to restrain the by-laws and ordinances of corporations. Bacon.

In the beginning of this record is inserted the main law or institution; to which are added two by-laws, as a comment upon the general law. Addison.

BY-MATTER. n. s. Something incidental. I knew one that, when he wrote a letter, would put that which was most material into the postscript, as if it had been a by-matter. Bacon.

BY-NAMES. n. s. A nick-name; name of reproach, or accidental appellation.

Robert, eldest son to the Conqueror, used short hose, and thereupon was by-named Court-hose, and shewed first the use of them to the English. Camden.

BY-PAST. adj. Past; a term of the Scotch dialect. Wars, pestilences, and diseases, have not been fewer for these three hundred years by-past, than ever they had been since we have had record. Cheyne.

BY-PATH. n. s. A private or obscure path. Hear'n knows my son, By what by-paths, and indirect crook'd ways, He comes, this crown. Drayton.

BY-RESPECT. n. s. Private end or view. It may be that some, upon by-respects, find somewhat friendly usage in usance, at some of their hands. Carew.

The archbishops and bishops, next under the king, have the government of the church: be not you the mean to prefer any to those places, for any by-respects, but only for their learning, gravity, and worth. Bacon.

Augustus, who was not altogether so good as he was wise, had some by-respects in the composing of this law; for to do any thing for nothing, was not his maxim. Dryden.

BY-ROAD. n. s. An obscure unfrequented path. Through slip'ry by-roads, dark and deep. They often elude, and often creep. Swift.

BY-ROOM. n. s. A private room within another. I pry thee, do thou stand in some by-room, while I question my puny drawer to what end be gave the sugar. Shakep.

BY-SPEECH. n. s. An accidental or casual speech, not directly relating to the point. When they come to allege what word and what law they meant, their common ordinary practice is to quote by-speeches, in some historical narration or other, and to use them as if they were written in most exact form of law. Hooker.

BY-STANDER. n. s. A looker on; one unconcerned. She broke her feathers, and, falling to the ground, was taken up by the by-standers. L'Estrange.

The by-standers asked him, why he ran away, his bread being weight? Locke.

BY-STREET. n. s. An obscure street. Thebroker here his spacious beaver wears, Upon his brow sits jealousies and cares; But on some mortgage, to avoid reproach, He seeks by-streets, and saves th' expensive coach. Gay.

BY-WALK. n. s. A private walk; not the main road. He moves afterwards in by-walks, or underplots, as diversions to the main design, lest it should grow tedious; though they are still naturally joined. Dryden.

The chief avenue ought to be the most ample and ornate; but these should be by-walks, to retire into sometimes, for ease and refreshment. Broome.

BY-WAY. n. s. A private and obscure way. Night stealths are commonly driven in by-ways, and by blind fords, unadorned of any but such like. Speener on Ireland.

Other by-ways he himself betook, Where never foot of living wight did tread. Speener
BY

Wholly abstain or wed: thy bounteous Lord
Allows thee choice of paths; take no by-way,
But gladily welcome what he doth afford.
Not grudging that thy lust hath bound and stands.

Herbert

A servant, or a favourite, if he be in want, and no other apparent cause of esteem, is commonly thought but a by-way to self-corruption. Bacon.
This is wonderfully diverting to the understanding, thus to receive a present, as it were, through a by-way, and apprehend an idea that draws a whole train after it.

Addison

BY-WEST. a.d. Westward; to the west of.

To Calcinate. See To Calcine.
CALCULATION. n. s. [from calceus; calcination, Fr.] Such a management of bodies by fire, as renders them reducible to powder; wherefore it is called chemical pulverization. This degree of the power of fire beyond that of fusion; for when fusion is longer continued, not only the more subtle particles of the body itself fly off, but the particles of fire likewise insinuate themselves in such multitudes, and are so blended through its whole substance, that the fluidity, first caused by the fire, can no longer subsist. From this union arises a third kind of body, which, being very porous and brittle, is easily reduced to powder; for, the fire having penetrated every where into the pores of the body, the particles are both hindered from mutual contact, and divided into minute atoms.

Quincy.

The residuum of bodies are thrown as soon as the distillation or calcination of the body that yieldeth them is ended. Boyle.

This may be effected, but not without calcination, or reducing it by art into a subtle powder.

CALCINATORY. n. s. [from calcinate.]

A vessel used in calcination.

To CALCINE. v. a. [calciner, Fr. from caler, Lat.]

1. To burn in the fire to a calx, or friable substance. See CALCINATION.

The solids seem to be earth, bound together with some oil; for if a bone be calcined, as so called, the stress force will crumble it, being immersed in oil, it will grow fins again. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. To burn up.

Fier dozen that union have calcin'd, Almost as many minds as men we find. Denham.

To CALCINE. v. n. To become a calx by heat.

To CALL, v. a. [from calage, Fr. hemp], with which leaves are stopped; or from eagle, Sax. the keel. Skinner.

To stop the leaks of a ship.

There is a great error committed in the maner of calling his majesty's ships; which being done with rotten oakum, is the cause they are leaky.

Raleigh's Essays.

So here some pick out bullets from the side;

Some drive old oakum through each seam and rift;

Their left hand does the calaging iron guide,

The ratting mallet with the right they lift. Dryd.

CALKER. n. s. [from calk.] The workman that stops the leaks of a ship.

The ancients of Gebal, and the merchants ther-of, were in these they callers; all the ships of the sea, with their mariners, were in thee to occupy thine merchandise.

Ezek. xxvii. 9.

CALKING. n. s. A term in painting, used where the backside is covered with black lead, or red chalk, and the lines traced

1. To name, to denominate.

And God called the light day, and the darkness
he called night.

Genesis i. 5.

2. To summon, or invite, to or from any place, thing, or person. It is often used with local particles, as up, down, in, out, off.

Be not amazed; call all your senses to you;
defend my reputation, or bid farewell to your good life for ever.

Shakes. When came not the slave back to me when I called him?

Shakes. King Lear.

Are you cal'd forth from out a world of men,
To slay the innocent?

Shakes. Rich. III.

Loddenius, that famous captain, was called up,
and told by his servants that the general was fled.

Klopstock's History.

Or call up him that left half told
The story of Cambuscan bold.

Milton.

Drunkenness calls the watchman from their towers; and then evil proceeds from a loose heart, and an untamed tongue.

Taylor's Holy Living.

The soul makes use of her memory, to call to mind what she is to treat of.

Dupa's Rules to Devotion.

CALL

Such fine employments our whole days divide;

The salutations of the morning tide;

Call up the sun; those ended, to the hall

We wait the lawyers for. Dryden.

Then by consent abstain from further toils,

Call'd off the dogs, and gather up the spoils.

Addison.

By the pleasures of the imagination or fancy,

I mean such as arise from visible objects, when we call up their ideas into our minds by paintings, statures, or descriptions.

Why dost thou call my sorrow up again?

My father's name brings tears into my eyes.

Addison's Cato.

I am call'd off from public observances, by a domestic affair of great importance.

Tatler.

The passions call away the thoughts, with inscant importance, toward the object that excited them.

ardours of piety, or to summons into the church.

Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ, called to an apostle, separated unto the gospel of God.

Rom. i. 1.

7. To invoke; to appeal to.

I call God for a need on my soul, that, to spare you, I came not as yet unto Corinth.

2 Cor. i. 23.

8. To appeal to.

When that lord perplexed their counsels and designs with inconvenient objections in law, the authority of the lord Manchester, who had trod the same paths, was still called upon.

Clarendon.

9. To proclaim to publish.

Nor ballad-singer, nor above the crowd,
Sings with a note so shrilling, sweet, and loud,
Nor parish clerk, who calls the psalm so clear.
Gay.

10. To exiute; to put in action; to bring into view.

He swells with angry pride,

And calls forth all his sports on every side.

Cowley.

See Dionysius Homer's thoughts refine,

And call new beauties forth from every line.

Peope.

11. To stigmatize with some opprobrious denomination.

Deafness unqualifies men for all company, except friends; with whom I can call names, if they do not speak loud enough.

Swift to Pope.

12. To call back. To revoke; to retract.

He also is wise, and will bring evil, and will not call back his words, but will arise against the house of the evil-doers; and against the help of them that work iniquity.

Isaiah, xxxvii. 2.

13. To call for. To demand; to require;

to claim.

Madam, his majesty doth call for you.
And for your grace, and you, my noble lord.

Shakes.

You see how men of merit are sought after;
the underserver may sleep, when the man of acc tion is called for.

Shakes.

CALL

Among them he a spirit of phrensy sent,
Who hurt their minds,

And up'd you on, with mad desire,
To call in haste for their destroyer.

Milton's Samson Agonistes.

For master, or for servant here to call,
Was all alike, where only two call.

Dryden's Fables.

He commits every sin that his appetite calls for,
or perhaps his constitution or fortune can bear,

Rogers.

14. To call in. To resume money at interest.

Hume describes an old usurer, as so charged with the pleasures of a country life, that, in order to make a purchase, he called in all his money; but what was the event of it? why, in a very few days after, he put it out again.

Addison's Spectator.

15. To call in. To resume any thing that is in other hands.

If clipped money be called in at all once, and stopped from passing by weight, I fear it will stop trade.

Neither is any thing more cruel and oppressive in the French government, than their practice of calls in their money; after the sun is sunk it very low, and then calling it anew, at a higher weight.

Spect.

16. To call in. To summon together; to invite.

The heat is past, follow no further now;

Call in the poors, good cousins Westmoreland.

Shake.

He fears my subjects loyalty.

And now must call in strangers. Descham's Soph.

17. To call over. To read aloud a list or muster-roll.

18. To call out. To challenge; to summon to fight.

When their sovereign quarrel call'd em out
His foes to mortal combat they deny.

Dryden's Virgil.

To CALL. v. n.

1. To stop without intention of staying.

This meaning probably arose from the custom of denoting one's presence at the door by a call; but it is now used with great latitude. This sense is well enough preserved by the particles on or at; but is forgotten, and the expression made barbarous by in.

2. To make a short visit.

And, as you go, call on my brother Quintus,

And pay him, with the tribunes, to come to me.

Ben Jonson.

He ordered her to call at his house once a week, which she did for some time after, when he heard no more of her.

Temple.

That I might begin as near the fountain-head as possible, I first of all call'd in at St. James's.

Addison's Spectator.

We call'd in at Morge, where there is an artificial port.

Addison on Italy.

3. To call on. To solicit for a favour, or a debt.

I would be both to pay him before his day;
what need I be so foreward with him, that call'd not on me?

Shake. Henry IV.

4. To call on. To repeat solemnly.

Three call upon my name; thrice beat your breast,

And hail me thrice to everlasting rest.

Dryden.

The Athenians, when they lost any men at sea, went to the shores, and, calling thrice on their name, raised a cenotaph, or empty monument, by their memories.

Addison on the Odyssey.

5. To call upon. To implore; to pray;

Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.

Psalm i. 15.
CAL

CALL, n. s. [from the verb.]
1. A vocal address of summons or invitation.
   But death comes not at call, justice divine.
   Mend's not her lowest pace for pray's onsite.
   Milton.
   But would you sing, and rival Orphans' strain,
   The wond'ring forest soon should dance again:
   The moving mountain hear the powerful call,
   And headlong streams hang list'ning in their fall.

2. A requisition authoritative and public.
   It may be feared, whether our rural widows and contented themselves to be always at the call, and to stand to the sentence, of a number of mean persons.
   Hooke's Preface

3. Divine vocation; summons to true religion.
   Yet he at length, time to himself best known.
   Remembering Abraham, by some wondrous call,
   May bring them back repentant and sincere.
   Midn.
   4. A summons from heaven; an impulse.
   So justly then will impious mortals fall,
   Whose pride would bow to heav'n without a call!
   Reaconman.
   Those who to empire by dark paths aspire,
   Still pic'd a call to what they most desire.
   Dryden.
   St Paul himself believed he did well, and that he had a call to it, when he persecuted the christians, whom he confidently thought in the wrong, but yet it was he, and not they, who were mistaken.
   Locke.

5. Authority; command.
   Oh, Sir! I wish he were within my call or yours.
   D'uhrahm.

6. A demand; a claim.
   Dependence is a perpetual call upon humanity,
   and a greater incitement to tenderness and pity,
   than anything else.
   Addison's Spect.

7. An instrument to call birds.
   For those birds or beasts were made from such pipes or calls, as may express the several tones of those creatures, which are represented.
   Wilkins's Mathematical Magic.

8. Calling; vocation; employment.
   Now through the land his curse of souls he stretch'd.
   And like a primitive apostle preach'd:
   Still cheerful, ever constant to his call.
   Dryden.
   By many follow'd, lov'd by meat, ador'd by all.

   Upon the sixteenth was held the sergeant's feast at Buffalo place, there being nine sergeants on call.
   Bacon.

CALLAT.]  n. s. A trull.

CALLIT.]  n. s. A call.
   He call'd her whore: a beggar, in his drink,
   Could not have laid such terms upon his call.
   Shakesp.

CALLING, n. s. [from call.]
1. Vocation; profession; trade.
   If God has interwoven such a pleasure with our ordinary calling, how much superior must that be, which arises from the survey of a pious life?
   Surely, as much as Christianity is nobler than a trade.
   South.
   We find ourselves obliged to go on honest industry in our callings.
   Rogers.
   I cannot forbear warning you against endeavouring at wit in your sermons; because many of your calling have made themselves ridiculous by attempting it.
   Swift.

2. Proper station, or employment.
   The French found the Roman senators ready to die with honour in their callings.
   Swift.

3. Calling the布朗s united by the same employment or profession.
   It may be a caution to all Christian churches and magistrates, not to impose celibacy on whole calllings, and great multitudes of men or women, who cannot be suppressible to have the gift of continence.
   Hammond.

4. Divine vocation; invitation or impulse to the true religion.
   Give all diligence, to make your calling and election certain.
   2 Pet. 1. 10.
   St Peter was ignorant of the calling of the Gentiles.
   Hockwlll on Providence.

CALLIPERS, n. s. [callipers.]
I know not the etymology; nor does any thing more occur, than that, perhaps, the word is corrupted from clippers, instruments with which any thing is clipped, inclosed, or embraced.
Compassed with bowed shanks.

CALLISITY, n. s. [callisity.]
A kind of swelling without pain, like that of the skin by hard labour; and therefore when wounds, or the edges of ulcers, grow so, they are said to be callous.

Quin.

1. Hardness; induction of the fibres.
   The often we use the organs of touching, the more of these scales are formed, and the skin becomes the thicker, and so a callousness grows upon it.
   Cheyne.

2. Insensibility.
   If they let go their hope of everlasting life with willingness, and tend their final perdition with exultation, ought they not to be esteemed destitute of common sense, and abadoned to a callousness of heart and number of soul?
  tures, they two points to their described width, and turn so much stuff off the intended place, till the two points of the callipers fit just over their work.
   Mose'. Mechanical Exercises.

CALLOUS, adj. [callus, Lat.]
1. Indurated; hardened; having the pores shut up.
   In progress of time, the ulcer becomes callous and callous with induration of the glands.
   Warner.

2. Hardened; insensitive.
   Lecenstness has so long passed for sharpness of wit, and greatness of mind, that the considence is grown callous.
   Dryden.

3. The wretch is drench'd too deep.
   His soul is stup'd, and his heart asleep.
   Fatt'd in vice, so callous and so gross.
   His sins, and sees not, senseless of his wrongs.
   Dryden.

CALLOUSNESS, n. s. [from callous.]
1. Hardness; induction of the fibres.
   The oftener we use the organs of touching, the
   more of these scales are formed, and the skin becomes the thicker, and so a callousness grows upon
   it.
   Cheyne.

2. Insensibility.
   If they let go their hope of everlasting life with willingness, and tend their final perdition with exultation, ought they not to be esteemed destitute of common sense, and abandoned to a callousness of heart and number of soul?

CALLLOW, adj. Unfledged; naked; without feathers.
   Bursting with kindly rapture, forth disclosed
   Their callow young.
   Milton.

Then as an eagle, who with pious care
   Was beasting wildly on the wing for prey,
   To her now silent airy does repair,
   And finds the callow fledge for' th' away.
   Dryden.

Long in small heights they know to try their young,
And teach the callow child her parents' song.
Prior.

CALLUS. n. s. [Lat.]
1. An induration of the fibres.
2. The hard substance by which broken bones are united.

CALM, n. s. [cainm, Fr. calme, Dutch.]
1. Quiet; serene; not stormy; not tempestuous; applied to the elements.
   Calm was the day, and smooth the trembling air
   Sweet breathing, avens and daisies did softly play
   A gentle spirit, that lightly did allay.
   Hot Titan's beams, which then did glister fair.
   Spencer.

So shall the sea be calm unto us.

2. Undisturbed; unruffled: applied to the passions.
   It is no ways congruous, that God should be frightened men into truth, who were made to be wrought upon by calm evidence, and gentle methods of persuasion.
   Atterbury.

The quenched her speech with calm attention hears.
Her eyes restrain the silver-streaming tears.

CALM, n. s.
1. Serenity; stillness; freedom from violent motion; used of the elements.
   It seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or overturning violence.
   Raleigh.

Can steer the ship in calms; but he performs
The skilful part, can manage it in storms.
Denham.

2. Freedom from disturbance; quiet; repose: applied to the passions.
   Great and strange calms usually portend the most violent storms; and therefore, since storms and calms do always follow one another, certainly, of the two, it is much more eligible to have the storm first, and the calm afterwards: since a calm before the storm, is sometimes an omen of a man's own making; but a calm after a storm, a peace of God's.
   Swift.

To CALM. v. a. [from the noun.]
1. To still; to quiet.
   Neptune we find busy, in the beginning of the Juxinis, to calm the tempest raised by Juxinis.
   Dryden.

2. To pacify; to appease.
   Jesus, whose bare word checked the sea, so much exerts himself in silencing the tempests, and calming the distant storms, within our breasts and minds.
   Dryden.

   Those passions, which seem so calmly composed, may be entirely laid asleep, and never more awakened.
   Atterbury.

   He willit to stay.
   The sacred rites and betake them to pay.
   And calm Minerva's wrath.
   Pope.

CALMER. n. s. [from calm.]
The person or thing which has the power of giving quiet.

Angling was, after tedious study, a rest to his mind, a solace of his disconsolate state, a calmer of unquiet thoughts, a moderator of passions, a procurer of contentedness.
   Walton.

CALMLY. adj. [from calm.]
1. Without storms, or violence; serenely.
   In nature, things move violently to their place,
   and calmly in their place; so virtue in ambition is violent, in authority settled and calm.
   Bacon.
   His curled brows
   Frown on the gentle stream, which calmly flows.
   Denham.

2. Without passions; quietly.
   The nymph did like the scene appear,
   Serenely pleasant, calmly fair;
   Soft her words, and flew the air.
   Prior.

CALMNESS, n. s. [from calm.]
1. Tranquillity; serenity; not storminess.
   While the steep torrent roughness of the wood
   Stretches with the gentle calmness of the flood.
   Denham.

2. Mildness; freedom from passion.
   Sir, 'tis fit
   You have strong party, or defend yourself
   By calms, or by absence: all is in anger.
   Shakesp.

   You would lay by those terrorst at your face;
   Till calms to your eye's first restore.

   I am much used I can beg no more.
   Dryden.

CALMY. adj. [from calm.]
Calm! peace-full. Not used.

253
And now they nigh approached to the sted,
When they nighly descended: it was a still
And calm bay, on one side sheltered
With the broad shadow of an horne hill;
Fairy Q. Calomel. n. s. [calomelas], a verbal word. Mercury six times surnombed.
He prescribed both purgatives, with calomel, once in three or four days.

Their ceaseless roar; and only sheds its leaves,

Or must, which the revolving spring restores. Philips.

CECITY. n. s. [cæcitias, Lat.] Blindness; privation of sight.

They are not blind, nor yet distinctly see; there is in them no cecity, yet more than a cecity; they have sight enough to discern the light, though not perhaps to distinguish objects or colours. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

CECUTIENCY. n. s. [cætuticius, Lat.] Tendency to blindness; cloudiness of sight.

There is in them no cecity, yet more than a cecitocy. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

CEDAR. n. s. [cedrus, Lat.] A tree.

It is ever green; the leaves are much narrower than those of the pine tree, and many of them produced out of one tuft, resembling a painter's pencil; it hath male flowers, or catkins, produced at remote distances from the fruit on the same tree. The seeds are produced to the cone, after a long, and irregular manner, which is continually choked with green leaves, so regularly, as to appear at a distance like a green carpet, and, in waving about, make an agreeable prospect. It is surprising that this tree has not been more cultivated in England; for it would be a great pleasure to have it naturalized in certain mountains, even in Scotland, where few other trees would grow; it being a native of Mount Libanus, where the snow continues most part of the year. Manmedel, in his Travels, says, he measured one of the largest cedars on Mount Libanus, and found it to be twelve years six inches in circumference, and sound. At about five or six yards from the ground, it was divided into five limbs, each of which was equal to a great tree. The wood of this famous tree is so handsome proof against the destructive animal bodies. The sawdust is thought to be one of the secrets used by the mountebanks, who pretend to have the embalming mystery. This wood is also said to yield an oil, which is famous for preserving books and writings; and the wood is thought by Bacon to continue above a thousand years sound.

I must yield my body to the earth: Thus yields the cedar to the axe's edge, Whose arms gave shade to tender wheat; Under whose shade the ramping lion slept; Whose top-branched overtop'd Jove's spreading And kept low shrubs from winter's pow'rful wind. Shaks.
To CEIL. v.a. [cela, Lat.] To overlay, or cover, the inner roof of a building. And the greater house he ceiled with fir-tree, which he over-laid with fine gold. 2 Chron. 2. 3. How will he, from his house edited with为基础, be content with his Saviour’s lot, not to have where to lay his head? Decoy of Plenty. 3. 4.

CEILING. n.s. [from ceil.] The inner roof. Varnish makes ceilings not only shine, but last. And now the thickened sky. Like a dark ceiling stood, down rush’d the rain Impetuous. Milton’s Paradise Lost. So when the day by day, or night by night, Strike on the polished’r’s brass their trembling light. The glittering species here and there divide, And cast their luminous beams from side to side; Now on the walls, now on the pavement plays, And to the ceiling flash the glaring day. Dryden.

Peace, peace, for shame, if not for charity.

| Uncharitably with me you have dealt.
| Shakspe.

Only add.

Deeds to thy knowledge answerable, add faith,
Add virtue, patience, temperance; add love,
By name to come call'd charity, the soul
Of every other good, Milton.

Faith believes the revelations of God; hope expects his promises; charity loves his excellencies and perfections.

But lasting charity's more amply swing,
Nor bound by time, nor subject to decay,
In happy triumph shall for ever live.

Pray, sir,
Charity, or a love of God which works by a love of the neighbour, is greater than faith or hope.
